Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. And command Congress, of course—for that would be included—and command the Supreme Court, certainly, for that would clearly be included.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Idaho and myself are much in accord in the construction of that provision, and the eminent Senator from Missouri and myself are at variance in the construction of it. Now I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from Idaho developed the line of thought that was running in my mind and stated the substance of what I was about to say.

Mr. KING rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Then to the Senator from Utah I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the statement just admitted by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, which in effect, as I interpreted his remarks, was that in the prosecution of the war the President could do anything which he conceived to be essential and necessary for the prosecution of the war, permit me to invite the Senator's attention to this fact, which was developed in the Civil War: President Lincoln, in the prosecution of the war, felt that is was wise and necessary to have arrested about twelve to fifteen thousand men, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, to deny to men the right which the Constitution and the Bill of Rights gave to them. The Supreme Court of the United States in the Milligan case, as well as in others, overruled the view of President Lincoln and held that many of the acts to which I referred were unconstitutional, notwithstanding the fact that we were in a great crisis and that the enemy, to wit, the rebel States were at our door, and there was much more danger to the Republic than apparently now the Republic is in danger from the enemies beyond the sea.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, there has been as much misunderstanding and as much misconstruction of the Milligan case expressed on this floor by eminent Senators as from any other quarter. The only thing decided in the Milligan case, notwithstanding the dissertation generally, was that the writ of habeas corpus, a civil remedy which exists in the law of the Federal Government as well as in the States, had wrongfully been suspended and martial law illegally declared. It was held that such was not in the power of the President or Government at that time. Secondly, that you could not take from a man charged with an offense who had the right at that time to be tried in a civil tribunal the privilege of being so tried in a civil tribunal and remit him to a miltary court.

All other expressons, Mr. President, as to the power of a President of the United States during war were amplifications in one form or the other of respective powers; but I may say to my eminent friend, who is a distinguished lawyer—the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]—that case did not go to the extent that his observations would indicate of holding to the effect such as he recited. I have assumed to state the only real thing which was decided.

But, Mr. President, if my eminent friend is right, that the Milligan case suggested a narrower field of limitation in the treatise delivered, and if it is intimated that from that decision that such power as we give the President would be disapproved, or opposes my assertion that when war has been declared he has the right to carry on the war in any manner to his judgment necessary, then I tender the thought as to the effect of subsequent decisions by the same court upon similar powers following and despite the Milligan case—I beg to call attention that it is in Fourth Wallace where is decided the Milligan case. Subsequently, sir, in consonance with the dissenting opinion in that case, which in certain respects is the better reasonings and also the better law—the Supreme Court of the United States, in Miller against United States, which came along in Eleventh Wallace, touching similar powers as were discussed in the Milligan case, the full court there said:

> The Constitution confers upon Congress expressly power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules respecting captures on land and water. Upon the exercise of these powers no restrictions are imposed.

Then says the court:

> Of course the power to declare war involves the power to prosecute it by all means and in any manner in which war may be legitimately prosecuted.

Surely no phraseology of the Senator from Idaho or of my own can compare in general comprehension of power to that expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The answer of the Senator from Illinois to the inquiry of the Senator from Idaho not only astonishes me but bewilders me as well. I hope I did not understand the Senator correctly, and to clear it up I ask him this question: Does the Senator from Illinois say that the President of the United States may exercise all the powers that are granted or bestowed in this bill without any legislation whatever? Could he exercise these powers simply because he is by the Constitution made the Commander in Chief of the armies and navies of the United States?

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the eminent Senator from Iowa that he must have misunderstood both Senators. There was at that time no reference being made to the full power of the bill. The point that I insisted upon was that the President, as Commander, after declaration of war by Congress, had a right to command the armies, and he had the right to command everything else that would make success of the command of the armies, unless the action was in such violation of the justice and liberty of the country. That then this body would supervise to thwart it. The Senator from Idaho then rejoined that in the conduct of the war the President would have a right to conduct the war in a manner according to his own discretion, even though that discretion ran counter to the discretion of Congress. The whole provisions of the bill were not at that time being made the object of the observations.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho, as I recall it, asked the Senator from Illinois if it was asserted that the President could command all the men and all the resources of the country in the prosecution of the war without the intervention of Congress.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I did not so understand. I understood the Senator to mean that which I had previously asserted, that after Congress had given him power and war had been declared and he had been put into command, in execution of that command he could command all the elements necessary to execute it. To that, sir, I again subscribe my view.

Therefore, Mr. President, in view of the declarations of the Supreme Court of the United States in that very well considered cause to which I have alluded, I would say, sir, that the power given the President of the United States when we are at war with a foreign country is the full power of the Nation when the Nation has reposed in him the privilege to command the Army after the war has been declared. Then it is the Nation which is exerting its combined strength against the enemy, and the relative relation between the powers of the States reserved and the granted powers of the Nation have no possible application.

Sir, I say to eminent Senators who make the opposing contention with great ability, that I pause to ask them to apply a test. It is related throughout the country in the public press that there are States in the Union the large population of which is in opposition to the execution of war. It is charged that these large numbers would frustrate the undertaking if they get the chance. It is said, sir, that they would veto its accomplishment. Granting this charge to be true—which I hope is a libel upon any American citizenship anywhere—it is not clear, if these eminent Senators are right in asserting that this reserved power of States is to be consulted, that these opposing States would then have the right constitutionally through their voice—their Senators—to veto by virtue of that reserved power the execution of the war by the Nation through its Commander in Chief? There can be no other logic. The moment you concede the right to veto because of the reserved power in the States then you concede that it is the State that makes the war, not the Nation. Or concede that the State could veto the Nation in its declaration of war, notwithstanding the Constitution vesting Congress with the power to declare war. By such contention we are remitted again, sir, to the flames that burned into ruins through a part of this Nation the claims of the people in a civil conflict upon the question of the sovereignty of the State as opposed to the sovereignty of the Nation. Upon this issue the Nation's sons were pitted against each other in the most memorable contest the world has ever recorded of bravery and sacrifice of mankind. Shall all those battles have been fought in vain—shall the results achieved bear no lesson? Surely eminent Senators who have not had time to reflect, relying serenely upon an ancient construction, must see that if they prevail in their views war could be frustrated by the representatives of any State of the Union that opposed the war.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I have extreme respect and, indeed, affection for the distinguished Senator from Illinois, and I do not want that affection to be at all diminished by an assertion upon his part of a doctrine which, if I understand him, would not do justice to his splendid intellectual powers. I understood the distinguished Senator, in combating the view announced by the Senator from Missouri, to take the position that because the Senator from Missouri asserted there were certain reserved rights left to the States, or reserved by the States, the States or any individual State, if it did not approve of the war, would have the right, in the language of the eminent Senator, to veto the prosecution of the war. Does not the Senator remember that the Constitution expressly gives to the Federal Government—and it is a Government of enumerated powers—the right to declare war, the right to raise and equip armies and navies? The States having given that power to the Federal Government, does not the Senator know that it would be therefore impossible for any State, after Congress had acted and war had been declared, to veto the acts of the Federal Government, and that such an act, if it were concerted and became an overt act, would be treasonable and would bring down upon the head of the offending State the just vengeance of the national authority, of the Federal Government?

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to reciprocate the complimentary allusion of my friend to myself and return it with cordiality, and to assure him that the friendship between us can not be affected by mere differences between myself and so eminent a lawyer as I know him to be on a constitutional construction.

But, Mr. President, I accept the exact statement of the Senator from Utah. The Constitution has provided that the Nation shall declare war. But, sir, it has provided that we shall not only raise armies, but support them; and in this provision for the uses of armies it is also provided that the President of the United States shall be the Commander in Chief for the execution of the purpose of the armies. That is why I contend that if the States had yielded the power, as the Senator from Utah says, which we all concede, then it yielded all the power necessary to execute the power. Otherwise we make a farce of the concession. Then, sir, when they yielded the power to declare war they yielded the power to the Commander in Chief to execute that which it had declared he should execute when it had been declared to be executed.

Therefore, sir, the proposition that has been asserted upon the reserved powers in the people and those given the States can not be enforced here because, as I again remark, the Senator from that particular State which asserts that reserved power of opposition would feel justified on the floor to veto the measure to carry on the war wherever in his power he could. I use the illustration. The Senator might differ from its logic. It is to show how inapplicable the construction ventured by very eminent lawyers—able Senators on this floor—must be of that clause of the Constitution reserving to the States and the people a necessary power, when compared to that power that vests the power of command in the President of the United States.

Mr. President, I have for days listened to the able Senators who expressed their fear of the abuse of this power if vested in a President. This fear is really worthy of note. It is commendable on the part of Senators that they should bring us to a consideration of its possibilities. It is that possibility of the violation of the limitations of the power and debauching it that makes it appropriate for Senators to cry the warning.

Mr. President, I welcome that. I welcome it that we may have properly brought to our attention from competent and influential sources the lesson which governments have learned from those who have violated power because it was reposed in them.

This question therefore turns not upon the constitutional limitations nor does it turn upon the construction of constitutional powers. It turns rather upon the personal equation. The question there is whether you are willing to confide the power to the present occupant of the office. That must be tested by the confidence you have in the source to which you are to confide the power. Clearly, therefore, we are brought then again to the personal interrogatory, are we willing to trust the execution of these powers in the hands of any of those to whom the Constitution intended it should be vested—a President?

Now, Mr. President, as the eminent Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] expressed it in the opening of his address day before yesterday, that it was an abuse by the rulers of Rome of power that warned. He said rulers of Rome went mad with the exercise of too much power. Sir, such has ever driven men mad. The Roman governor hurled at Paul the insinuation that too much learning had made him mad, but the learning which the tyrant inveighed against on the part of Paul was the power of his knowledge of the Roman constitution, which denied that Roman freemen could be brought in chains to answer a verbal impeachment of a Roman tetrarch or a justice of the peace which had been made against him. It is true there are those who have gone mad in the exercise of power, and having become maddened in that exercise, have done mad and foolish things.

Mr. President, no doubt the Senator from Massachusetts alluded particularly to Nero and the house of the Antonines. Let it be remembered in that era of Rome these were sovereign over every citizen and over every life and over every kind of property. There was no form of supervision. The body of the people had no vote or voice. There were no elections conducted, as prevailing in our land periodically, by which evils could be corrected and abuses remedied. The spirit of the times in the thousand years that have elapsed has given great improvement, let us believe, and made inapplicable the impeachments of the Senators based on the fears expressed. I refer particularly to my distinguished colleague, Senator SHERMAN—great jurist as he is—to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], to whom I have alluded, or of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], the most persevering and most effective advocate on this floor of what may be called the State rights doctrine. Nor need we fear the forebodings of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the advocate of the agricultural interests from his part of the country. All these have brought forward their conception of the wound that might be inflicted by those who hold such power as we would give if this power should be perverted.

I concede the possibility; I admit the propriety of all these arguments; but, Senators, I have this interrogation: Should all power be withheld from any man because some men are unworthy of exercising it, and this upon the theory that such power may be perverted because those who exercise it may be disloyal enough to debase it? Shall we deny all power to those of whom we have no fear? I answer no. If you say to the contrary that such power or principle should never be granted, that would be argument sufficient to never repose it in any mortal man upon any state of circumstances. Therefore, as I see it, we are remitted to the question of when and where shall it be trusted.

Mr. President, I have not always agreed with the President of the United States. We have been at open variance in matters of detail of government. These expressions of difference have come from me in conversation with the distinguished Chief Magistrate from time to time. It is only fair to say that where we have differed he prevailed [laughter]; but, sir, that was because of his power and not of my preference.

But, sir, I could never bring myself to the conception that any President of the United States whom the people of the United States would ever select to hold that office would ever be so unwise to himself as to pervert a power given to his hands to preserve his country. Why should he do such? For what profit could be such? Where is the man in the Republic who has ever done such? To the glory of this country, however much parties or people have differed in political contests, however bitter have been the strife; however vicious the conflicts—yes, however violent the swinging and swaying in fury have been these warfares—we are all compelled to certify that after the election never yet has a President of the United States of America so debauched these institutions that we are compelled to shame and blush for him before the world. Barring the single instance of the differences of opinion by President Johnson as to the execution of certain powers of Government and the disposition of them, there has never been even the intimation from any source that any man to whom power has been given by the popular voice of our whole country has ever debased it. We may have differed, sir, as to the manner of its execution. Will any Senator assume that this man Wilson, coming from the people, through the power of the people, exercising the power given him by them, shall pervert it or debase it? Shall it be denied that this man Wilson is ambitious? Shall we forget that he is human? While there may be the inclination on the part of men, where there is uncontrolled power, to draw to themselves the power only for private profit, let us contemplate the difference when we apply it to the present case.

Woodrow Wilson, let us know, dreams of deserving well of his fellow men while he lives; he hopes for the praise of his country when dead. Shall he go out, sir, and commit suicide to his own aspirations? Shall he murder the hopes of his heart and slay the inheritances of his children? That, sir, can not be conceived. That he wishes well of his country and of himself would be, sir, a guaranty sufficient against any perversion or pollution of power. As power has never been debauched by his predecessors, he will never debase it as their worthy successor.

But, sir, if the selfish interests were not to be weighed in this balance of determination, justice compels us to admit that Woodrow Wilson is an American citizen and a patriot. As such, sir, we have the guaranty complete that there could never be this violation to the extent that Senators fear, and never, sir, to any degree that could be to the injury and against the welfare of his native land, where he was born and his children born after him—all to live and survive upon his name, upon his glory. For myself, sir, I have no fear.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have listened to a number of Senators who have spoken against this bill, but I do not recall having heard any one of them make any observations that would indicate that he thought that the present occupant of the White House would pervert or abuse any power that was conferred upon him. Is it not—and I ask this as a question of the Senator from Illinois—the fact that whatever opposition has been developed to this measure, as exhibited in the statements of Senators, has resulted from the fact that they doubted its constitutionality; doubted the expediency of the legislation; doubted whether or not, if all these powers were granted to the President of the United States under the instrumentalities created by this bill, economies would be worked out and the results which were anticipated by the people would be realized? Is not the Senator from Illinois rather unfair to the Senators who have spoken in imputing to them a criticism of the President?

Speaking for myself, if I can persuade myself that this bill is constitutional, I shall vote for it, although I will say now that I very much doubt that the benefits anticipated by the people will be realized in the passage of the measure.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I always welcome an interruption, and I particularly welcome it from the distinguished Senator from Utah, whose desire always is to see that justice shall be done both in acts and in declarations. The Senator from Utah is correct. No Senator on either side of this Chamber has made personal allusion to the President of the United States in the form of any accusation as to himself personally debauching or perverting this power. Those who have spoken upon that phase divided their argument: One was on the constitutionality of the act; the other was on the inexpediency of violating the precedents of our country and vesting such power as the bill confers in the hands of an executive.

The fear was, to use the words of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that the President—not Woodrow Wilson, but the President, whoever he might be, whoever he was—might, with such precedents established, take advantage of them somewhere, somehow, some President. That because of such, flowing from that temptation to so draw power to one's self, there might grow the perversion and debasement which has followed too much power on the part of those who have gone mad in its exercise.

The point I wish to emphasize is this: I concede the position, as the distinguished Presiding Officer will recall, that there is danger. I answer my able friend from Utah [Mr. KING] and say I am one of those who impeach this power as a general exercise. I would regard it a dangerous thing, as I said in the beginning, and as I say now. The precedent has its dangers; it should be a lesson; and Senators who warn that in the investment of this power there lurks evils and that there may follow destruction from quarters which we know not now, do a service to the Senate. I am only able to reply that, while I concede the merit of the objection and the salutary lesson of the warning, yet I being conscious that the bill limits the exercise to the mere period of the war, I am forced to the position that expediency justifies vesting that power, and I assert that there need be no fear that the danger that might be apprehended from some quarters at some time, might ever arise in the present circumstances of the present Executive, who shall execute this measure. It was because of that, among other reasons, sir, that I support it.

I took the liberty to point out in the beginning that there was no specific provision of the Constitution that the investment of these powers specifically violated. I summoned my eminent friends of the Senate to lay their hands upon the provision of the Constitution which this power, proposed to be vested in the President, violates. The Senators, of course, respond as they will be compelled to do, that it is the construction of phraseology, instead of the words of the phrase, upon which they stand.

Mr. President, I have this to say, that, sir, what other position I might take at some other time, at this time this I utter must now be mine: This war is declared. I wish it had not been. I did everything within my power to avoid the necessity for declaring it. I neither courted it nor welcomed it; but when necessity made it just to declare it, it became the conflict of my country, and everything that I can contribute to bring to it success will be done as it has been done and will be done, of course, by every patriot in this Chamber—to which tribute let it be added there are no exceptions in the membership of this body.

But, sir, as to the ways and means, this I do assert, that when this war has been declared and when we avail ourselves of the provisions of the Constitution to place the command in the President of the United States, this is our position: We must either vouch the President the full power to command everything necessary to conduct the Army, even though the discretion conferred opposes our own, or we deny that provision the full effect and meaning, and thus defeat it in its force. Then, sir, we must give the President of the United States full authority in every respect or exempt him from responsibility. We can not charge him with the responsibility for the result and withhold from him the power necessary to execute that result. If we are to withhold the power and take it ourselves, then let Congress assume the responsibility, and tell the people of the country that we have assumed the power and that Congress will conduct the war by directing every ways and means and that we have withdrawn from the President the exercise of his discretion, and substituting that of our own. Then, sir, our country can place the responsibility upon us, because we will have assumed the authority. On the other hand, so long as we shall apply that constitutional clause and charge the Chief Magistrate as the Commander in Chief with the responsibility—as we know the country and the world will—I say give him the fullest power essential to the fulfillment of the clause of the Constitution vesting in him the command of the Army and Navy.

Sir, the power in the Constitution "to raise and support armies" may interest you. In the beginning of the constitutional debates, as Senators will recall in the making of the Constitution, all there was in the draft respecting armies was "to raise armies." It was after days debate in one form or another that our fathers found it necessary to adopt the expression from the Greeks, really taken out of the provisions of the Achean League, which, when literally translated, finds a definition in the English words "support, keep, uphold, maintain." Therefore they wrote in the Constitution the word "raise," and then they added afterwards, as an amendment, the words "and support."

Sir, how can an army be supported? There are but two ways: One is with money appropriated to pay for the obligations incurred; the other, sir, is to provide methods and means to maintain their blood and physical means—food and life. The very provision of the Constitution, which, sir, after great deliberation was adopted, carries to your mind and to the minds of all of us that it was the very thought and theory of our fathers that the word "support" was to receive the full construction of "maintain, uphold, and sustain."

Therefore, Mr. President, it becomes necessary, as you see, sir, that this authority must be conferred in order that responsibility shall be charged. Senators must accept the Commander in Chief; Congress must accept him; the Nation must accept him; the world shall accept him; and the future historian of our times in the days to come shall write, I pray, that in our acceptance of him we did honor to ourselves and glorified the cause in which he commands. Sir, upon that theory and definition, which I dare venture in this distinguished tribunal, I support these powers being vested in the Commander in Chief as they are written in this bill.

Now, sir, I turn to the position that the eminent Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], long a justice of the highest court of his State, learned, indeed, in the law; the eminent Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], as we have seen, a constitutional lawyer; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber who joined with them, have often assumed—that the main provisions of the bill are unconstitutional. Heretofore, sir, I have not been discussing this phase of the subject, though I did give license to Senators to assume so from the fact that occasionally I would be compelled to enter the field. The Senators referred to—in their full arguments, seeking to express the views of their constituents and their own—have contended that the bill is unconstitutional. Their position being that by taking these powers from the citizen and assuming to legislate over his private affairs we are violating that section of Constitution, which, I take it, they would assume, guarantees to each citizen liberty. The eminent Senators feel that they are justified in concluding that the word "liberty" means liberty of personal conduct, private business, and personal pursuits. That the preamble of our great Document, guaranteeing, as the foundation stones of this Republic, "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," can not be executed if the Government takes into its hands the direction of these particular elementals so necessary to be controlled by each person for himself if he is to enjoy the blessings of happiness.

Sir, there is much in that argument; there is so much in that argument that, anxious as I am that every measure of power be given the Government, I warn myself against overstepping it. Sir, I prudently admonish myself that merely because I can find justification for this measure I shall not find license within myself to give similar justification in every measure of similar import at any other time.

It will be a dark day for this country when there shall be a complete ignoring of the fundamental doctrines upon which this Government is constructed. Sir, as well hope to ignore the foundation stones upon which this building is erected and trust that without a base it would maintain its balance as to hope that this Government can ever survive free without some charter prescribing, in the language of the Divine injunction, "thus far, and no further." But, sir, the distinction lies not in whether the Constitution applies to our country as a Constitution; the question, sir, for us is, Wherein is this particular legislation of power a violation of any provision of the Constitution?

I said yesterday by way of parenthesis, pending the debate between the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and certain Senators on the Republican side, that I was one of those who felt that, as to certain powers in this bill, the provision in the Constitution to which the eminent Senators alluded was suspended in their operation and had no application. I now shall demonstrate what I mean.

The provisions of the Constitution, sir, as to life, liberty, and property, applicable to legislation as between the citizen and his own country, I assert have no place in the construction of the same powers as to property and privileges as between the citizen and his nation when his nation is at war for the preservation of the citizen and the nation. I insist that there is no constitutional privilege vested in any man which rises superior to the power of his government to preserve that man against destruction from a foe without. However much that provision may be invoked to preserve him as against the power of his nation against him in affairs of his own country it can have no application to limit the power of his government in the exercise of war power which has for its purpose the preservation of the country itself.

Senators, can I speak more strongly that view than the Supreme Court of the United States, in an observation to which I fancy Senators have not had their attention drawn in the great rush of things that I know have engaged them? I ask the Senators' attention to this.

In the One hundred and thirtieth United States, far, sir, after the days of war, and quite beyond the days when we were so disturbed by passion that we might charge an opinion to partisan zeal—the Supreme Court of the United States had occasion, in this very late opinion, to say—I read from page 606 of the One hundred and thirtieth United States:

> To preserve its independence, and give security against foreign aggression and encroachment, is the highest duty of every nation, and to attain these ends nearly all other considerations are to be subordinated. It matters not in what form such aggression and encroachment come, whether from the foreign nation acting in its national character or from vast hordes of its people crowding in upon us. The government possessing the powers which are to be exercised for protection and security is clothed with authority to determine the occasion on which the powers shall be called forth, and its determinations, so far as the subjects affected are concerned, are necessarily conclusive upon all its departments and officers.

Mr. President, the eminent Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who leads for this bill upon the minority side of the Chamber—"minority"—produced copious quotations demonstrating the constitutionality of this act in a general sense. I could not improve on them; I would not fatigue the Senate by again quoting them; but I take the liberty to invite attention, in addition to them, to a few observations of the highest tribunals of our country, which eminent Senators, industriously giving attention to the details of this bill—have not had time to call the attention of this body to, or have not had time to have their attention called to.

I ask you, sir, as I asked these eminent lawyers, has any language of mine approximated in its assertion of power this opinion in One hundred and thirtieth United States, written in the cool, calm judgment of the greatest tribunal of the world? Measuring the constitutional power of this land, and, sir, anticipating the day when aggression from foreign shores might come, this court laid down the chart by which we could be guided, and there, sir, if I do not burden this body, it specifically says:

> It matters not in what form such aggression and encroachment come, whether from the foreign nation acting in its national character or from vast hordes of its people crowding in upon us. * * * To preserve its independence and give security against foreign aggression and encroachment is the highest duty of every nation, and to attain these ends nearly all other considerations are to be subordinated.

Mr. President, I know there has been much argument on the constitutionality of this bill. I know Senators have called attention to the Milligan case. I have already referred to my distinction as to that cause, but I should like to read a few words, and but a few, from two other sources.

I call attention to the observations of Mr. Madison on the Constitution. The eminent Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] I heard the other day quote Alexander Hamilton, a most respected authority upon that phase to which the Senator was alluding; but I invite attention to the views of one who was made a President of the United States by those who contended that the power of Government should be limited, as is contended by the eminent Senators who oppose this measure. Says Mr. Madison—I read this in the light of the opinion to which I have just alluded:

> With what color of propriety could the force necessary for defense be limited by those who can not limit the force of offense? If a Federal Constitution could chain the ambition or set bounds to the exertions of all other nations, then, indeed, might it prudently chain the discretion of its own Government and set bounds to the exertions for its own safety. * * * The means of security can only be regulated by the means and the danger of attack. They will, in fact, be ever determined by these rules and by no others. It is in vain to oppose constitutional barriers to the impulse of self-preservation.

Will my eminent and distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. REED], the eminent Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], or those who have heard me to-day assume that any utterance of mine can approximate in the strength of its extension the utterances of Madison, or that of the Supreme Court in One hundred and thirtieth United States, written in the cool calmness of reflected judgment when we were not at war, and there was neither passion nor zeal to animate the action?

But I want to call attention to a few words, Mr. President, in the Legal Tender case—an observation of Justice Bradley which I feel has not had accent. Says Justice Bradley—this is in the Twelfth Wallace, later, of course, than the Milligan case:

> It is absolutely essential to independent national existence that government should have a firm hand on the two great sovereign instrumentalities of the sword and the purse, and the right to wield them without restriction on occasions of national peril. In certain emergencies government must have at its command, not only the personal services, the bodies and lives of its citizens, but the lesser, though not less essential, power of absolute control over the resources of the country.

Surely there can be no stronger expression anywhere. This bill merely gives, at the very furthest contention, absolute control over the resources of the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. Pardon me; let me finish the clause and then I will yield to the Senator gladly:

> Its armies must be filled and its navies manned by the citizens in person. Its material of war, its munitions, equipment, and commissary stores, must come from the industry of the country.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I concede that the Federal Government has power over the resources of the country; but does it not exercise that power over the resources through the taxing power? How else may it obtain the resources with which to prosecute the war, except through the instrumentalities of the taxing power? Does the eminent Senator mean to asseverate that the Federal Government may go and confiscate property when and as it will? Must it not rather exercise the power of prosecuting war—the controlling of the sword and the purse, as stated by Justice Bradley—in consonance with the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I said awhile ago that there seems to be a misunderstanding. There is no contention that the Constitution of the United States should not always, when possible, be complied with. I said yesterday, as I have alluded to here to-day, that there were certain provisions of it which I contended had no application now, however much they would have application under different circumstances when we were at peace.

I now answer the Senator: No; I can not concede that the power to lay hands on the resources of the country is born of the power of taxation. I do concede that in laying hands upon the purse, under the ordinary circumstances of government, it is through the power of taxation, conjoined to the power of government; but in time of war I respectfully assert that the power of the Government to lay its hand upon the resources arises from altogether another source. It arises from the inherent power of a Government to command, by any means at hand, those resources essential to maintain the Government.

Condemnation, as an illustration, does not grow from taxation. Therefore, condemnation is one of the methods by which we appropriate property and take resources. Commandeering, as an officer of the Army, as Commander in Chief, does not arise from the power of taxation. Taxation is an incident to it.

I respond to my eminent friend by saying that the power by which we draw to ourselves all the resources is the power of government to be exercised, of course, not without the Constitution, but within the spirit of the Constitution that vests in Congress the power to provide methods of conducting the war, and in the President of the United States the discretion of directing it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. Gladly.

Mr. REED. A moment ago the Senator stated that there were certain parts of the Constitution that were suspended in time of war. Now, it would be very interesting to have those parts of the Constitution catalogued. I think it would bring this debate down to a point where we might get to an issue.

I am going to ask the Senator now if he will not be so kind as to tell us what part of the Constitution of the United States has been abrogated and is abrogated at the present hour?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator permit me to answer——

Mr. MCKELLAR. I want to add just one question.

Mr. LEWIS. May I reply to the Senator from Missouri? Then I will gladly yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, my eminent friend, the Senator from Missouri, said it would be most interesting if I could detail what provisions I feel are suspended in their operation, which was my expression. I regret that my discussion was not more interesting than an attractive luncheon to my friend; that he was compelled to forsake me during this discussion, or he would have heard the full catalogue of this matter, which I have amplified to the best of my ability while he was absent; but I am willing to repeat what I then said if I do not burden other Senators by the repetition.

Mr. REED. No; if that is the case I will get the speech of the Senator in the RECORD, if he has really made a catalogue. I was called from the Chamber on some matters connected with the Senate, and I did pause on the way to get lunch, in order that I might be able to hear the Senator through. I regret having missed anything he had to say, but I really felt a little faint in view of the prospect of the annihilation of the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LEWIS. Let me respond to the Senator from Missouri, and then I will yield.

Mr. President, I can understand that the eminent Senator from Missouri would feel a sense of tremor at the contemplation of annihilation of any Constitution, and I am glad he gave an early illustration of his feeling by preserving his own constitution first with his lunch. [Laughter.] I think he did wisely, rather than endure a discussion in this hot weather of such fundamentals as I am dealing with, with which he is so thoroughly familiar. Since he does me the honor, as he always does when he can, to be present at my discussion, I am not averse to saying that when he uses the term "catalogue the provisions of the Constitution," he uses a figure of speech which, of course, does not define what I said nor what I meant. I will adopt for my definition that which I said before—that there were certain provisions of the Constitution which were suspended in their operation in the conflict between this Nation and a foreign country, one of which I will now illustrate to the Senator—the one he read—that which prescribes a limitation of powers as between the Federal Government and the States. I respectfully urge that has no application save as to the exercise of power by the National Government upon the States and the preservation of the States over that centralized power. But when war is declared those demarcations are at once ended, because the provision of the Constitution that grants to the Executive the power to command the armies vested in him the power to command the armies that come from the States, called militia, as one illustration, and vested in Congress the power to command the States without regard to that constitutional provision.

There I demonstrate to my eminent friend one of the provisions which I respectfully suggest are suspended in operation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—I think, however, I ought to let the Senator proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator. I am glad to have the interruptions. I welcome them. They help me to gather my own viewpoint.

Mr. REED. Of course, if that is the answer, it is so easily answered——

Mr. LEWIS. That is one of the parts of the Constitution to which I referred.

Mr. REED. And it does not at all answer my question. The Senator now states that the provision that all powers not expressly granted, or carried by necessary implication, are reserved to the States, does not apply in time of war; but that would only go to the question of power. What I am trying to get at is, What guaranties of the Constitution there are that are suspended? To illustrate, Is the guaranty of property suspended, or does it continue to exist—that property shall not be taken without due process of law? Is the right of trial by jury suspended?—and so forth. That is what I am trying to get at. I am just illustrating with those two. There are many others.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I answer the Senator.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator does answer, permit me to make the question a little broader. Under the Constitution the Government is divided into three coordinate branches—the judiciary, the legislative, and the executive. Is the judiciary abolished? Is the legislative abolished? Are they all concentrated in the executive?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the difference between the eminent Senator from Missouri and myself is that he finds it agreeable to employ hyperbole which I can not adopt. His expressions, such as "abrogated" and "repealed," referring to certain constitutional provisions, have never been used by me. They are not used now.

Mr. REED. Well, "suspended." I will accept the term "suspended."

Mr. LEWIS. My observation was, "suspended in their operation."

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. In the manner in which they were construed by the Senator. Now I answer him to the point:

I have given the Senator one illustration which he says is a matter of power. I agree with him. That is what I have been insisting on—that powers conferred for one set of uses are suspended when they come to another set of uses. That has been my whole argument. Second, I answer the Senator as to the other. First, he says, in time of war, are the relative coordinate powers of the executive, the judicial, and the legislative suspended? I answer, yes; to a very great degree. I will illustrate:

They change in their form of operation. Otherwise martial law could never take effect. There are reasons why which occur at once to your mind. If the application were enforced in time of peace, then the Congress of the United States would exercise the privilege of executing powers in time of war that were peace powers only; we would certainly not be found in time of peace voting that the Chief Executive shall do the things which we do grant him in time of war, but that is because there is a provision of the Constitution that lies perfectly dormant until war is declared, and then it rises in its fullness of operation, but it is not abrogated.

Mr. REED. What is that provision?

Mr. LEWIS. Allowing him to command with discretion; authorizing him to do things in that condition of things which in time of peace would not be taken from the legislative body and vested in an Executive.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, there is no such language in the Constitution. There is a provision that the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and that is in peace as well as in war.

Mr. LEWIS. I am obliged to infer that the Senator was absent when I read the Supreme Court decision that gave such a complete recognition—written in time of peace—and I called the attention of my eminent colleagues in that provision of the highest court of the land. The Senator will get its meaning in reading my speech, if he shall have occasion, and then I would be glad to have him amplify his views to the contrary.

Now I return to the query the Senator from Missouri makes, Do I believe that part of the Constitution which says that private property shall not be taken without due process of law, and if I would abrogate it? I do not contend that it is abrogated, but I do contend that its ordinary operation is suspended. What is due process in time of peace is not due process in time of war, and what is the process for the necessities of war would not be admitted to be due process in time of peace. I illustrate it. In the time of the Civil War property was seized and taken without compensation because of the necessities of the war. When there was an attempt to recover, the answer was the war necessities made it necessary that the armies should move, and the constitutional power did not protect or stand against it. Andrew Jackson took property down in Louisiana, and took it forcibly, and when they sought to show that he had violated the law he was vindicated—that it was no violation of the Constitution or the Articles of War—but a sum of money was subsequently paid or tendered.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator say that Jackson was not fined?

Mr. LEWIS. There was public opinion in Louisiana and in certain parts of the country, and the eminent Senator then from Kentucky, Mr. Clay, tendered condemnation; but a distinguished predecessor of the Senator from Missouri, Mr. Benton, defended and justified Jackson; and, though a resolution was tendered and passed in this body censuring Jackson, it was subsequently expunged, and Jackson found vindication here, the courts holding that his main act was not a violation of the Constitution.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator forgotten that Mr. Jackson was fined for infringing the rights of citizens?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not deny it; but, as I have recalled, it was expunged in that particular. Though the act was a violation of ethics, it was not a usurpation on the part of those who executed it. The expunging was like the reversal of the higher court, I will say to my eminent friend.

Mr. REED. Is it not true that he was fined and paid his fine, $1,000.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator forgets. If the Senator asks if he was fined for taking property, I answer no. The fine that was levied upon Jackson was not for the taking of property but because he violated a specific order touching methods in taking the property. He was specifically vindicated for taking the property. After he took the property an incidental matter arose which was the subject, as the Senator will recall, of the fine proceedings. The Senator is being misled by his memory. Jackson was fined for contempt after the property was taken.

Mr. REED. If there is anything clearly settled, it is that Jackson violated the law at that time; and, of course, the hero of the Battle of New Orleans would have been vindicated by the American people for anything, almost, that he might have done, and they did vindicate Jackson for many things because of their great admiration for the man. But I do not think the Senator means seriously to say to the Senate that the Jackson controversy, to which we are now referring, furnishes an example that the Constitution of the United States was suspended except that the constitutional operations might be suspended by force at any time if the force is great enough.

Mr. LEWIS. What I urge is that there are illustrations to prove what I respectfully insist, that the Constitution, in so far as the matters are concerned touching the property of the citizen of the country in time of peace, is construed differently as to that same citizen in time of war. The operation applicable in time of peace is suspended in its effect in time of war. Otherwise we would realize that we never tax the citizen or take property until after condemnation and a jury trial and judgment. So the Army, in moving, is compelled to remove obstructions and may repel an invading enemy from a foreign shore. There is an illustration which I think the Senator will accept as pertinent.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will permit me, that matter has been mentioned—I mentioned it myself many weeks ago in this controversy—and I will state the rule that is laid down by the court. It is that when this country is at war that part of the country which is not occupied by the military and where business is open is governed just as it always is governed—the ordinary civil processes must be followed—but within the war zone, where the military actually is, where a state of war actually exists, martial law may be held to obtain and the right to take property where the necessity is immediate and where the military actually is in occupation exists.

That is entirely different from saying that a declaration of war depends upon the Constitution. That doctrine simply goes to the effect that where there is an actual state of war, and within the war zone, the military power for the time being is superior to the civil power. But it is true in no other place, and I shall be able to show the Senator many authorities to prove it.

Mr. LEWIS. I again must call the Senator away from his inclination of mind of using expressions which define what he means but which are not the expression which I use. I have never used the words "suspended the Constitution." I specifically drew the distinction between those who claim the Constitution is suspended and those who, as I do, insist that certain operations of the Constitution will operate in one way in time of peace and are suspended in that form of operation in time of war. I have given one illustration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the junior Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask this question: The Senator says that certain operations of the Constitution are suspended during time of war. Who has the right to pass upon that question and say when those operations of our Constitution are suspended? Where is the power to pass upon it? In other words, so that the Senator may get my question accurately, I believe the Senator gave a list—I was not present; I am sorry I was not—of those parts of the Constitution the operation of which is suspended during the war. If the Senator has one in his mind, I wish to ask him who has the power under our Constitution to say that those particular clauses of the Constitution are not to have effect during a time of war?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, that there may be no misunderstanding, I did not make a list of any particular provisions of the Constitution. I recited one or two phrases from some provisions of the Constitution and gave my viewpoint in what manner they did not operate in war times as in times of peace, and the construction by the court has shown that application. I refer to Justice Bradley's opinion in the Legal Tender cases, in which he so thoroughly set out this thought. I now answer the Senator from Tennessee as to the particular points for which he rose.

The junior Senator from Tennessee asked me who has the power to suspend these provisions. I announce to the Senator they are not suspended by the action of any person. They are not suspended by the declaration of any authority. The Constitution itself automatically, by virtue of the war power written in the Constitution in order to execute those powers, suspends the others which conflict with the operation of the necessary ones. That execution in war time, according to the way in which they are carried out in time of peace, would be nugatory of the war powers and destroy them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator then explain to me who has the right to say when these powers are automatically suspended? As I read the Constitution there is but one authority, and that is the judicial authority of our Government. Have we as legislators, who hold up our hands and swear we will uphold and defend the Constitution, the right to say that certain clauses or phrases of the Constitution are suspended? Is not the Senator in error about it, and is not the fact that none of us, neither the executive authority nor the legislative authority, have any power to say when these provisions automatically are suspended, to use the Senator's own expression?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the operations of the Constitution which I think are suspended in their form of operation in war times as compared to how they would have been operated in time of peace automatically serve their office in time of war as they did in time of peace by act of Congress. Congress when it declares war, in that declaration of war sets the machinery of war in action as opposed to those machineries that are essential in time of peace. Wherever the war powers conflict with the machinery that applies in peace time, one is suspended. This operates as a result of the declaration of Congress declaring war. I answer my eminent friend from Tennessee that it is such that is the authority that suspends.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask, does the Senator mean to say that as soon as Congress declares war by that declaration there is an inferential repeal of the Constitution in regard to anything that may come up in reference to that war?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator said a while ago that we are sworn to uphold the Constitution. The difference between the able Senator and myself lies in this: I contend we are upholding the Constitution and executing its full meaning when we give a different form of construction to powers and different powers under the Constitution in time of war from what we do in time of peace. We are not abrogating the Constitution; we are not violating it. From my viewpoint we are upholding it by giving other powers and exercises which in time of peace are not invoked because not necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator misunderstood me. I know there are different provisions of the Constitution which apply in war time and in peace time, but the thing that I except to in the Senator's statement is that certain provisions of the Constitution are suspended in their operation during times of war; and if they are then I ask the Senator who has the right to suspend them?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Will the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield in a moment. My answer is, again, that certain provisions of the Constitution which operate in peace time in one way are suspended in that operation and operate in war times in a different way. Such was the intent of the framers of the Constitution, and the power invoked to make that change is that vested in the power to declare war, to wit, Congress. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to say that I gather from the Senator from Illinois this thought. I may gather it incorrectly, but it seemed pretty clear to me. It is as to the status created by the war. Take the provisions in the Constitution against taking private property for public use. You could not take feed for animals in time of peace because it would be taking private property, but in time of war that ceases in a way to be private property because it is necessary for the support of the Government. Now, suppose one man had all the food in this country in time of peace, it would be his, it would be private; you could not take it away from him; but in time of war would it be contended that it was not affected with such a public use that it could not be taken to support our Army and our Navy? In other words, war has created a new status, and that amendment of the Constitution therefore would not be effective.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me say at this point, the Senator was absent when the eminent Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and myself engaged in a colloquy on that very basis. I undertook to make plain that very distinction then and later to the Senator from Missouri. I thank the Senator from Iowa for illuminating what might have been obscure in my own definition. I agree with his attitude of mind.

Mr. REED and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I utterly deny the illustration and the conclusion from it. If one man in the country had all the food in the country and was holding it and starving the people of the United States to death the right of the Goverment to take that food and distribute it to the people would be exactly the same in time of peace as it could be in a time of war. In the illustration which the Senator has used, if we could imagine such a condition as he has stated to exist, there is not any question but the man using the food in that manner, withholding from the people and starving them to death, would simply be treated as an outlaw, and he probably would not live long enough to lock his door.

Mr. KENYON. That is true, but he is protected by the Constitution.

Mr. REED. The Senator's illustration, of course, is a very violent one. The right to take that food in time of peace to preserve the lives of the American people would be exactly the same as it would be in time of war to preserve the Army. There is not a bit of difference in my opinion. Both of them would rest upon the supreme law of necessity. Both of them would rest also upon the fact that the man engaged in the hoarding of food would have been engaged in the commission of a crime. However, it is a good deal like trying the question whether man is right when somebody holds a gun at his head.

Mr. KENYON. Somebody has a gun at our heads now.

Mr. REED. Exactly; somebody has a gun at our heads now; but the question we are asking and answering is this: The United States being at war, what are the limits of our right? If a man has a controversy with another man he does not have the right to kill that other man because he has a controversy. He only has the right to kill another man when the other man is seeking to take his life or impose upon him some other hardship which gives the right to take his life. If the enemy was actually in this country, or if a condition of affairs existed in this country where it was necessary for us in order to keep the Army from starving to death to do certain things, I think that by proceeding in the right way we could take the food in this country—I think it could be commandeered—but it would be when that condition had arisen to which I have referred.

Now, the courts have drawn that distinction.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator where he would draw the line? If we can take the food when an armed invader is actually here, we could take the food when the Army of the invader was nearly here, and then we could take the food so as to get ready to repel the army of invaders.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Illinois be so kind as to pardon me at this point?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri for this interpolation. The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Illinois are addressing the Senate and cooperating.

Mr. REED. The Senator invited everybody into this debate——

Mr. LEWIS. That is what I mean.

Mr. REED. And he is so enticing in his manner that one can not resist it.

Mr. LEWIS. I would the Senator could say that I was also seducing in my argument. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention now to this case. I think it would be well if Senators would examine it. It is in Thirteenth Wallace, page 623. In that case the military commanders took over three steamboats belonging to the plaintiffs because they were needed in transporting war materials during the Civil War. Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court and said:

> Private property, the Constitution provides, shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.
> Extraordinary and unforeseen occasions arise, however, beyond all doubt, in cases of extreme necessity in time of war or of immediate and impending public danger, in which private property may be impressed into the public service or may be seized and appropriated to the public use or may even be destroyed without the consent of the owner. Unquestionably such extreme cases may arise as where the property taken is imperatively necessary in time of war to construct defenses for the preservation of a military post at the moment of an impending attack by the enemy, or for food or medicine for a sick and famishing army utterly destitute and without other means of such supplies, or to transport troops, munitions of war, or clothing to reinforce or supply an army in a distant field, where the necessity for such reinforcement or supplies is extreme and imperative, to enable those in command of the post to maintain their position or to repel an impending attack, provided it appears that other means of transportation could not be obtained and that the transports impressed for the purpose were imperatively required for such immediate use.

I call attention to this language:

> But the public danger must be immediate, imminent, and impending, and the emergency in the public service must be extreme and imperative and such as will not admit of delay or a resort to any other source of supply, and the circumstances must be such as imperatively require the exercise of that extreme power in respect to the particular property so impressed, appropriated, or destroyed.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator who would determine the imperative necessity in that case; would it not be Congress?

Mr. REED. No; I think it must be determined as a matter of fact.

Now, there is one other case I call attention to. However, this is a State case—Fiftieth Mississippi. The court said:

> The necessity should be extreme, imperative, overwhelming in order to constitute a justification to expediency—

I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to this—> expediency or utility will not answer as to who will be the judge.

Mr. HUSTING. Will the Senator please state whether those decisions rest upon cases in war time?

Mr. REED. The first one was a case where steamboats were commandeered in the Civil War.

Mr. HUSTING. Who are to determine the fact; the military government or the court?

Mr. REED. The court did determine it. The military commander determined it in the first instance and the court in the last. There is one other case.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to ask the Senator just one further question. Is there anything in that decision to indicate that the President and Congress would not have a right to determine the fact whether commandeering was necessary in time of war?

Mr. REED. I think the whole trend of the decision is to the effect that it is a question of fact, and that the citizen is protected under the Constitution.

I did not intend to take so much of the Senator's time. I would be glad to put all these cases in and let the lawyers of the Senate have the benefit of them.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator will do that in the course of my speech, will he not?

Mr. REED. Yes; I wanted to put this one sentence in as qualifying the doctrine I have been giving. The statement is made with reference to certain other rights claimed as the rights of martial law, the rights of the military. They say this exists only over the camps and environment and near the field of military operations.

There are many authorities along this line which I shall give at the proper time.

Mr. McKELLAR rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I now yield to the junior Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to have any misunderstanding about my position. I have asked this question about the Constitution. It does not mean at all that I am opposed to the bill we are now discussing. I am very much in favor of the bill, and I believe it is constitutional under the authorities that we have heard read in the Senate so frequently lately. I believe there is ample authority in the Constitution for it, but where the Senator and I take issue is on the proposition that the bill can only be constitutional upon the principle that certain clauses of our Constitution are held in suspense by the declaration of war, as he explained it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the attitude of my eminent friend from Tennessee brings me in this position: It is related that when Broughton went to the woolsack he knew Bacon, and he sought Lord Bacon for a judgment as to how to conduct himself in the administration of his court. Bacon is reported to have said to him, "Give your judgment; do not give your reasons. Your judgment may be right, but your reasons may be wrong." The attitude of my eminent friend, the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee, is that in my conclusions he concurs, but to my methods of reasoning he dissents.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has well stated it. That is precisely the case. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I do not want to suggest to my distinguished friend from Illinois how to make his speech or upon what ground to place his conclusions——

Mr. LEWIS. It would aid me very much could I have the benefit of such wisdom.

Mr. KING. Because as to the former, he could make it very much better than I.

Mr. LEWIS. No; I could not.

Mr. KING. But does not the Senator feel that his argument would be better and stronger if he would place it upon the declaration of the great Chief Justice Marshall in the McCulloch case, if he would argue that this legislation was within the scope of the Constitution; that the necessity for it existed; and that then it was only a question as to whether or not the legislation was in harmony with that necessity? I might say to my friend, if he will pardon me, that on the 18th of June of last year the Supreme Court of Australia, in considering legislation somewhat of this character, referred to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. It is the case of Farey against Burnett, and I shall call attention to it in a moment.

Mr. KING. And they justified the legislation in Australia, which is legislation akin to this, largely upon the McCulloch case and upon other cases from our Supreme Court. I notice that Judge GARD, of Ohio, placed the majority opinion in the RECORD, but he did not place the dissenting opinion in the RECORD. Judge Isaacs, of the supreme court of Australia, gives a very illuminating decision, and it is very pursuasive in support of the constitutionality of this bill that is under consideration.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin if he wishes to interrupt me at this time.

Mr. HUSTING. I want to say to the Senator that I have followed his argument very closely and with a great deal of interest. I agree in his conclusions; but I merely want to put an interrogatory to him along the line of the argument he has made. Perhaps he has already covered it in effect, but does the Senator think that any construction can be put upon the Constitution as a whole which would lead to the effect and the necessary resultant absurdity of prohibiting anything that would result in the destruction of the Constitution itself?

Now, to illustrate: In order to have a constitution that is of any value we must have a country to sustain that Constitution, to back it up. The Constitution is a creature of the country. When the country is in peril, and the Chief Magistrate says so, and Congress has passed upon it, and a state of war is declared, we know that a state of peril exists, which may result in the destruction of the Government and in the destruction of liberty itself, which may result in reducing the Constitution to a mere "scrap of paper." In construing the Constitution in war times we must see the possibility of a destruction of our institutions and a conquest of the country. The question is, Does not the Senator think, therefore, that the Constitution must be construed in war times to permit anything to be done that will preserve the Constitution? Does not the Senator think it would be absurd to claim, notwithstanding the menace and the peril that we are in, that in attempting to carry out some of the provisions of the Constitution we thereby foreclose ourselves from saving the Constitution as a whole to the people; in other words, preventing it from becoming a mere "scrap of paper" and having somebody else's constitution and the will of some other country imposed upon us?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, replying first to the inquiry of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I am unable to answer whether I would make my own argument better by adopting his theory or whether I would make a better argument by basing it upon McCulloch against Maryland. It may be, sir, that nearly anything might improve the argument that I am making, and it may be any suggestion from a friend is a charity to divert me to some other course, lest I fall into further blunders, that seem to impress my friend from Utah as already too numerous. I decline, and I have constantly declined, to rest this bill upon McCulloch against Maryland. We have often alluded to that case in this tribunal. The eminent Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] only the other day, referring to some observations of mine, called attention to the fact that upon McCulloch against Maryland, and upon that alone, we could predicate justification for this bill. This is my viewpoint as to McCulloch against Maryland. I never knew an opinion from a supreme court that so begged the question at issue as did that. The question was whether or not a thing was constitutional, and in the opening words the court says, "Granted that the thing is within the scope of the Constitution, then the means necessary to carry it out are constitutional." I have always felt that the very expression "granted that it is within the scope of the Constitution" begged the whole question, for the question always is, Is it within the scope of the Constitution? The moment that we put a thing only upon McCulloch against Maryland we have to admit before we can do it that it has already been conceded that it is within the scope of the Constitution. My eminent opponents contend that this bill is not within the scope of the Constitution. So I can not see that McCulloch against Maryland is of such service to me that I am willing to use it as a predicate upon which to put my argument. I rather take the other view, that the constitutional powers of war are of a nature which, as I see them and view them from the constitutional power, differ from those applying to the domain of peace. For that reason I place my argument upon the exception which I say becomes a rule in times of war, and I do not have to recur to the doctrine announced in McCulloch against Maryland—the doctrines applicable in time of peace and which were ruled then as applicable to purely a peace question.

The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], ever alert and, as we have seen him constantly on this floor, ever active in seeking to preserve fundamentals, put to me the question, Am I not in danger by insisting that some phraseology of the Constitution is suspended in its operation, of committing an infraction, as it were, upon the whole Constitution and leaving it a document wounded in such a way that we do not have a complete document for the public as it is guaranteed?

I answer the Senator that he is not very far from a real condition. I have watched in Congress since I have come into public life the avoidance of the Constitution; then the evasion of the Constitution; then the ignoring of the Constitution; then the violation of the Constitution; and later the repudiation of the Constitution—and this in peace times. In measures that have been brought to this body—whether it was to build a nitrate plant in the South by Government money, whether it was to create a quarantine service for the health, or whether, if you please, to create an agricultural system, to provide something by a price-fixing system, or whether you provide for a supervision over the private crops of the people or of their property, I have gradually seen, sir, that we are building up in America to-day an unwritten constitution for the United States. We are building a constitution within the spirit of our written one, but in a new phraseology. That new phraseology derived from the measures passed to meet the necessities of the people. I answer my able friend from Wisconsin—for as I understand his question it comprehends, no doubt, the question from many other sources—that this is my view. It is as I see it, sir, that the time has gone by when the people of this country are so much concerned about the Constitution as they are about their institutions; and I for myself announce as my creed that I will not permit the obsolete provisions of a paper constitution to prevent the preservation of the human constitution.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I want to put the Senator from Illinois right. My question was rather a long one, and perhaps I did not make myself clear. I agree with the Senator that our Constitution will not be violated by the war measures that we are now about to take and have taken. On the contrary, my question was, whether to give the Constitution any other construction; that is to say, whether to give the Constitution a construction which would hinder and obstruct us from defending ourselves and the Constitution itself would not be an absurd construction? The construction which I suggest to the Senator must necessarily be placed upon the Constitution itself is that in time of national peril, when our institutions and the Constitution itself are imperiled, we can do all things necessary to preserve the Constitution and to preserve our institutions.

Mr. LEWIS. I probably did misapprehend the query of the Senator from Wisconsin, because his later explanation clearly discloses himself to be in harmony with my views, and certainly with my conclusions. I regard his last observations as a distinct contribution, and I accept them.

Mr. President, I should like to add a word or two, and I shall suspend this legal argument shortly, for it must be very burdening, but my friend from Utah called attention to a case I wish to let him know that I have. It is a case which I hold in my hand, and I want to read some features of it.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield at this time.

Mr. MCKELLAR. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois that he was rather inclined to disregard obsolete provisions of the Constitution, what has he to say about this language of our Supreme Court in the Milligan case:

> The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

Does not that answer the Senator, and is not the Senator mistaken in his view that any part of our Constitution or any provision or any clause or any phrase of it should be disregarded by anyone who has sworn to uphold it?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have heard read a great many times the citation which the Senator reads, and his devotion to it wins my admiration. It is a beautiful piece of diction; it is an elegant bit of rhetoric; it is a splendid juridical oration; but, Mr. President, it is one of those things to which can be applied the suggestion of a celebrated literary critic. He received a book from a writer he did not like. He reviewed the book as follows:

I have read the book; there is much in the book that is new and much that is true; but that which is new is not true, and that which is true is not new.

[Laughter.]

The Supreme Court of the United States did asseverate just as the distinguished Senator says, and from that time on, after having uttered that fulmination, has completely ignored that doctrine, as instances and proof will show.

For instance, in the Legal Tender cases, when the question came up before the Supreme Court of the United States, I say to my eminent friend, knowing him to be a distinguished lawyer from the South, that they refused to follow that doctrine. They quoted the case to which he has referred but spoke of the necessities of the situation of war as a justification for avoiding it. They not only, sir, would not follow the Constitution in that particular case respecting the "coining" of money, but, on the contrary, they claimed we had a right to suspend it, and practically it was suspended by the exigency of war. As my eminent friend knows, it became a tendency of the court to ignore these fundamentals, and when the interstate commerce regulation cases were before the court the court went so far as to ignore the Constitution of the United States as to those powers reserved to the States, which the eminent Senator from Missouri has aptly cited, and ignored it on the ground, I may say to my friend, not of war, but that the necessities of the new commerce called for a new rule. So they actually set the provision of the Constitution aside and placed the National Government in control even of the local commerce in the States, merely because it incidentally had a connection with interstate commerce somewhere or at some time. Therefore, I say to my friend that the court proceeded in the interstate commerce regulation cases, and in other instances, completely to ignore that splendid lecture, which I wish they had adhered to, for then I would not be in the position to-day where I am enforced to say, as I must say now, that I do not know when a thing is constitutional or not—according to what the opinions of the Supreme Court have decided.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Tennessee is still on his feet, and I yield to him. Then I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I merely wanted to ask the Senator a question that is very apropos at that point.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator this question: Because the Supreme Court of the United States in later cases may have determined as the Senator thinks, differently on a constitutional question, or because it has not lived up to the full measure of what the law was as laid down in the Milligan case, or because judges may have erred in their interpretation of the law, do those facts lead the Senator to think that he, as a member of this Government, sworn to uphold the Constitution, has a right to abrogate any of its provisions as obsolete provisions?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the fact that the Supreme Court has constantly ignored that fundamental doctrine laid down then indicates that they have come to the conclusion that a different construction of the Constitution should be made. Therefore, Mr. President, they have adopted a new form of construction, in some instances construing its provisions out of all application for that reason. I therefore contend that their later observations covering the subject matter are practically a repeal of their previous views—certainly a denial of them—and I respectfully urge upon the attention of my learned friend the Senator from Tennessee that where a provision has been so ignored in its application as to be no longer invoked it is obsolete. That as to such a provision I can not revive it into authority by recognizing it when it has suffered the death blow from a source which should have sustained it under the theory and form of our Government. That is what I mean by saying it is obsolete.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator has somewhat modified his statement. I simply wished to ask him, in view of the observations regarding the Supreme Court he had just made at the moment when I rose, whether he thought the decisions of that body were entitled to any further consideration? I understood him to say that they had changed their opinions and disregarded the Constitution; and if so, I would not think that they ought to be quoted as authority here or elsewhere.

Mr. LEWIS. My answer is that if there are exigencies in the Government where the Supreme Court of the United States may ignore the Constitution or give a construction to it to meet the exigency, certainly the legislative body then can afford to follow their example.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator one question then, and that is whether that last statement of his does not amount to this, that the people of a country may set up a government, delegating to their agents certain limited rights and reserving to themselves all other rights, and those agents may then, under the doctrine just now announced, at any time they, in their opinion, think the Constitution ought to be set aside, set it aside by merely declaring that in their opinion an emergency exists? Has there ever been a usurper who has ascended a throne who did not do it with the proclamation upon his lips that it was necessary to do it?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it is true that necessity has ever been the law of tyrants. It is also true that every kingly government that has attempted to usurp the privileges of a people and overcome them with power, has attempted to offer the excuse of necessity; but, Mr. President, notwithstanding that such might be the rule in kingly and monarchical governments, it has not been the rule in free governments. May I illustrate? No one on this floor presented a more able argument for the expediency of the eight-hour law for railroad workmen, which we lately passed, than did the eminent Senator from Missouri who has just addressed an inquiry to me. The able Senator will recognize that, upon the strict limitations of the Constitution being applied, that law would have been held unconstitutional; as interfering with State government and of private contract. Had the rules of decision on the Constitution rendered up to 1890 been followed, the law had not a place to stand or live; but the Supreme Court of the United States adopted as its argument for maintaining the validity of the eight-hour law the theory of the necessities of the time, the demands of commerce, the needs of life all as justifying the demarcation, the variation, and the innovation. The same was the argument for sustaining the child-labor law. Therefore, I am compelled to say there is much in the Senator's statement that I affirm, that a people may, because of the exigencies of the times, bring forth remedies necessary to meet particular evils such as we have done often, and such action because of those exigencies has been sustained even by the courts.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; gladly.

Mr. REED. I can not allow to stand uncontradicted the Senator's statement that I argued that the Constitution did not exist or that it could be pushed aside in the consideration of the eight-hour legislation. I argued, on the other hand, that the eight-hour legislation was within the constitutional power of Congress. But what I am trying to call the attention of the Senator to, is that this Congress is nothing except what the people made it; that we as individuals have no more right than any other individuals in the United States; that the only powers we have here are powers conferred upon us by the people; and that if the people have forbidden the doing of a certain thing, we are as powerless to annul the people's will as are those who are outside of this Chamber. I, therefore, utterly repudiate the doctrine that the Constitution, ordained and established by the people of the United States, has attached to it the infamous doctrine that it shall remain in effect only so long as Congress shall see fit to let it remain the will of the people.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am constantly paying tribute to the zeal of the Senator from Missouri for the Constitution. I again pay tribute, sir, to him and say the Constitution has no abler defender; and while I sometimes think the constructions which he imposes upon us are not sustained according to my line of reasoning, that can not reflect upon the sincerity of his undertaking and the splendor of his presentation of it. I differ from my eminent friend. I have expressed those differences. This little circle called the Senate Chamber here was constructed on those differences. If, sir, it were not for these differences of opinion this body, this temple, would not be erected. Had there have been a continuous one thought upon the part of the citizens of America, there would have been no reason for debating ground to express differences as to essentials and to arrive at a common conclusion of judgment or compromise. We are here for the purpose of expressing these differences, each expressing the viewpoint that he may have in behalf of what he thinks is for the best welfare of the Government. The Senator and I differ on this—and this is the crux of it—as I differ from those who follow him in the leadership he has manifested in this contest. I hold that the Constitution is not an inflexible instrument; that it is an instrument to be bent, if necessary, to great emergencies, in order that the emergencies may serve the uses and the welfare of the Government and not be an agency of its destruction. Second, I insist that in time of war every necessary means to carry that war to success on the part of the Government is justified out of the law of self-preservation. I beg to fortify my view by reading from an excerpt from One hundred and tenth United States, from the opinion of Mr. Justice Gray, when he said in one of the Legal Tender cases, to which I alluded in colloquy with my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]:

A constitution establishing a frame of government, declaring fundamental principles, and creating a national sovereignty, and intended to endure for ages and to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs is not to be interpreted with the strictness of a private contract. The Constitution of the United States, by apt words of designation or general description, marks the outlines of the powers granted to the National Legislature; but it does not undertake, with the precision and detail of a code of laws, to enumerate the subdivision of these powers or to specify all the means by which they may be carried into execution.

So it will be plain, Mr. President, that the difference between the eminent Senators and myself is one of the construction of power.

Mr. President, it will be remembered, sir, that William H. Seward, Secretary of State in the time of Mr. Lincoln, was called on to address a communication to Lord Lyons, who then represented the British Government. Lord Lyons insisted that we had violated our own Constitution by certain acts and that we had literally done so, I presume, can not, in the light of the present-day surroundings, be disputed; but Seward, in addressing this communication to Lord Lyons, called attention to the fact that to carry on the war which at that time we were engaged in the Constitution allowed the Executive to do such things as to his judgment were necessary to accomplish that result, and even the legislative body under the Constitution did not have the power to withdraw that discretion from him while he was commanding toward that success. Surely that question has not been seriously controverted since, save by the school of gentlemen, sincere, strict constructionists of the Constitution, which is ever to be desired, for however wrong they may be in separate instances they are generally needed to prevent the extreme going too far.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Missouri, as I do of my friend, the Senator from Tennessee. I have said that there was ground for a difference between the application of the provisions of the Constitution in time of war and in time of peace. Mr. President, the constitution of Australia was modeled after ours. I beg pardon; Senators, of course, knew that very well, and I did not mean to be pedantic and to give them unnecessary information. We know that, with very few changes, the preamble of our Constitution was literally adopted. Now, I ask attention to a case that followed the case to which the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] referred, a later cause. The question at issue was whether or not Australia could prescribe certain geographical limitations for the sale of food; second, whether she could constitutionally prescribe prices, and whether the constitution of Australia, prohibitive as against such legislation in time of peace, would preclude the possibility of such legislation in time of war. May I read a part of it, and only a part of it?

It is said that the measure of the power is the same in peace and in war, and as such a regulation as the one now under consideration would be invalid in times of peace, so it must be unlawful in the present circumstances. I have no hesitation in rejecting such an argument. It fails to grasp the all-essential fact that is comprehended in the power of defense—

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], as a vindication of his own views, to a very high authority—very high, sirs—as well as a justification of my own.

The constitution, it is true, provides for a distribution of powers—

To which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] appropriately alluded but a few minutes ago—but in doing so contemplates in general the normal orderly, peaceful progress of the nation, working out its own destiny, free from hostile aggression. Its continued existence and development for all time and in all circumstances, as a free, self-governing community under the British Crown, is a postulate of the constitution.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] but a moment ago, I think, intended to comprehend that thought in his expression.

Says the court:

Primarily it contemplates conditions of amity with the world at large. But the interruption of its normally peaceful condition is foreseen and provided for both by the express terms quoted and by the common law, which, as a part of our heritage so far as it is not altered by competent authority, stands behind the written fabric of our constitution to aid and assist us in understanding and applying it. The defense power may be exerted in times of peace, but so far only by way of preparation. Actual defense, and all that it connotes, comes only when we are at war. War creates its own necessities, proportioned to the circumstances, and not measurable in advance of the occasion; and defense is only complete when it meets those necessities, whatever they may prove to be. While peace prevails the normal facts of national life take their respective places in the general alignment and are subject to the normal action of the constitutional powers. Precedence as to their regulation is governed by recognized usage or expressed enactment, but always with reference to normal conditions.

A war imperiling our very existence, involving not the internal development of progress but the array of the whole community in mortal combat with the common enemy, is a fact of such transcendent and dominating character as to take precedence of every other fact of life, it is the ultima ratio of the nation. The defense power then has gone beyond the stage of preparation, and passing into action becomes the pivot of the constitution, because it is the bulwark of the State. Its limits then are bounded only by the requirements of self-preservation. It is complete in itself, and there can be no implied reservation of any State power to abridge the express grant of a power to the Commonwealth. Even if there be a concurrent power in the State, it is necessarily subordinate. If it were possible to give special legal prominence to this principle among Commonwealth powers, that must of necessity be accorded to the defense power. All other powers and authorities—Commonwealth and State—are necessarily dependent upon its effective exercise. For of what avail is the State right to regulate the internal sale of commodities if the State itself disappears? Or of what value is the Commonwealth right to regulate interstate and foreign trade if the Commonwealth is shattered? The best protection all the rights and powers so jealously, and in ordinary times so justifiably, defended can have, so far as Australia is concerned, is the very Commonwealth power that is now sought to be limited. The constitution can not be so construed as to contemplate its own destruction or, what amounts to the same thing, to cripple by checks and balances the ultimate power which is created for the undeniable purpose of preserving at all hazards and by all available means the inviolability of the Commonwealth and of the several States. Let me advert as an instance to a section which has been referred to in argument and which admirably tests the situation, because it is so inherently clear. Section 92 in the most positive terms places beyond Commonwealth and State control alike the freedom of all interstate commerce and intercourse. But though in ordinary times of peace this can not be infringed, could it be asserted for a moment that it limits the war power? Can every citizen demand the right of passage from State to State, though military necessity is openly opposed to it? Is it the function of this court to declare the supremacy of that provision, literally construed, over the organic power of defense? But if not, is it not because the new element of war destroys the ordinary perspective of national life, and gives by the very nature of the circumstances a paramount authority to the defense power, without which the ninety-second clause would be a senseless inscription on the instrument of government? The essential fact is that Australians are belligerents as well as citizens, and for the moment the character as belligerents is preeminent and must receive the first consideration.

Mr. President, the opinion proceeds—and I have but a word more, for reading is always burdensome. The eminent Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], likewise the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], had the query propounded to the Senator from Iowa as to what would be the tribunal to determine when this should be suspended and under what circumstances, and whether a question of the Constitution or a question of fact should be the governing question in such an emergency. Let me go to that part of the opinion which, I think, being participated in by a full court, will interest the distinguished Senators, although it may not to them be conclusive.

Says the court:

As I read the constitution, the Commonwealth, when charged with the duty of defending Commonwealth and States, is armed as a self-governing portion of the British Dominion with a legislative power to do in relation to national defense all that Parliament as the legislative organ of the nation may deem advisable to enact in relation to the defense of Australia as a component part of the Empire, a power which is commensurate with the peril it is designed to encounter, or as that peril may appear to the Parliament itself; and, if need be, it is a power to command, control, organize, and regulate, for the purpose of guarding against that peril, the whole resources of the continent, living and inert, and the activities of every inhabitant of the territory. The problem of national defense is not confined to operations on the battle field or the deck of a man-of-war; its factors enter into every phase of life and embrace the cooperation of every individual, with all that he possesses—his property, his energy, his life itself—and in this supreme crisis we can no more sever the requirements and efforts of the civil population, whose liberties and possessions are at stake, from the movements of our soldiers and sailors who are defending them than we can cut away the roots of a living tree and bid it still live and bear fruit, deprived of the sustenance it needs.

I do not hold that the legislature is at liberty wantonly and with manifest caprice to enter upon the domain ordinarily reserved to the States. In a certain sense and to a certain extent the position is examinable by a court. If there were no war and no sign of war, the position would be entirely different. But when we see before us a mighty and unexampled struggle, in which we as a people, as an indivisible people are not spectators but actors, when we as a judicial tribunal can see beyond controversy that coordinated effort in every department of our life may be needed to insure success and maintain our freedom, the court has then reached the limit of its jurisdiction. If the measure questioned may conceivably in such circumstances even incidentally aid the effectuation of the power of defense, the court must hold its hand and leave the rest to the judgment and wisdom and discretion of the Parliament and the executive it controls, for they alone have the information, the knowledge, and the experience, and also, by the constitution, the authority to judge of the situation and lead the nation to the desired end. Certain facts are before the court by admission; others are notorious. I do not enter into the circumstances further than to perform my duty as I have stated it. As to the desirability or wisdom of the regulation complained of, it is not my province to speak, but as a matter of law I have no hesitation in holding that such a regulation is one which, as a defense regulation, is within the competency of the legislature in the condition of affairs that now exist.

The opinion concludes:

Since this judgment was delivered I have observed the recent case of The Zamora (32 T. L. R., 436). Lord Parker, for the privy council, said (32 T. L. R., at p. 445): "Those who are responsible for the national security must be the sole judges of what the national security requires. It would be obviously undesirable that such matters should be made the subject of evidence in a court of law or otherwise discussed in public."

Mr. President, I know we are not bound by the opinions of a court of Australia. They but serve as precedents. But since the court of Australia founded its ruling upon a constitution that was copied from our own, I am sure eminent Senators will see that the positions I have taken here have been fortified by the expressions of an eminent judicial tribunal that could not be blind to the theory of liberty or the justice of government. Mr. President, I insist, as I have insisted, that this proposed act is constitutional. By all the provisions of law that apply to it, it is constitutional. By the necessities of the situation, it is justified. By the reasoning of the Constitution as intended to be applied in time of war, it is vindicated; and, sir, upon that Constitution, as I have brought forth from my construction, I justify the measure.

But, Mr. President, it would not matter to me if it were otherwise. My eminent friend and beloved friend, I may add, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] feels deeply wounded, from his conscientious convictions, that I should have the views that I have expressed. Sir, so far as I am concerned, if it were left to me I would not argue for this law by the measure of a constitution. I would turn and realize the conditions of my country, and see its food held by that avaricious set of patriots who measure all their devotion by pocketbook returns. I would behold these bloated individuals with their Gorgon eyes gleaming toward this body in hatred for that it assumes to govern and control them, while they hold in their selfish grasp the very means of life of the citizens and soldiers, yet smirk and leer at the authority which this body assumes in its control over them. The food pirate, the coal barons, the steel and iron tyrants, the money masters, and the Neros of the necessities of life; they who calculate for war and distress of country that they may fatten in illegal wealth on the needs of their land by extortion put upon the citizen in his hour of helplessness. I would place such as these in such pillory that they could not return to these undertakings, bringing by their persecutions this Republic to desolation and its people to destruction.

Sir, not upon the law of books but upon the law of the heart; not on the law of men but upon the law of the soul; not upon the law of legislators but upon the justice of mankind I am content to present this bill, with conviction in my bosom that the court does not live in America that will not hear the voice of the people murmuring behind the curtains which divide its sittings from the populace and heed their muttered prayers for deliverance. The courts will recognize the necessity and justice of the law and by such sustain it upon the great constitutional doctrine that that which is right for the preservation of a land is right to be enforced for man. My mind recalls the great exclamation of Pitt, when, standing to defend a measure in Parliament, he said:

> I decline to stand upon law bound down in dog's-ears to justify this measure. I lay my hand on my heart and feel the pulse beat of the need of my country, and upon that I stand, as it is the law of Heaven when it is the law of a people needed to justify and maintain themselves.

Mr. President, I have a long time engaged myself in this discussion, much longer than was my intention, but the interruptions of Senators—gladly welcomed, throwing light upon my own argument for myself—have contributed, of course, to the length of time occupied.

Mr. President, there is a final feature to this constitutional phase which I here confess as having much influence on me. Senators, as I see it a new era is upon this Government. Whether we welcome it or not it is here. It is the theory of all governments, like the accretion in geology, that as time operates upon it, it takes its new form after the order of its necessity, though like geological strata, each stratum being akin to the other, apparently cemented to the common whole but being apart from the other in its elements created by the course and operation of years. This Government has been going through different mutations from time to time, as necessities required, until to-day it is a Government of powers never dreamed of by the fathers, and one exercising privileges that no man in past years would ever have assumed it would have taken unto itself. These have been combated as they have come along in legislative chambers and have been contested before the courts of the country; but in the exigencies of time the necessities and needs of the Government have justified the changes and adopted the innovations, so that the courts have been blind to any variation between the measures and the fundamental law called the Constitution. So it is that now we find these measures, so frequently reprobated as unconstitutional during their making, later upon test before the courts justified from the highest judicial tribunals—the final arbiter.

Sir, we are again at a new era. The time has come when, for the preservation of this Republic, the Government will nationalize itself and take control of all of those instrumentalities necessary for the conduct of the country and the preservation of the citizen. No line of demarcation between State and Federal Government will be allowed to interpose itself as a barrier to this new movement. No construction of the Constitution, however subtle or philosophical, will ever be successful in being urged as an obstacle. The needs of a people, brought about by the rapaciousness of those who control by power and terrorize by tyranny, cry out for relief. There has been disclosed by long test but one agency that seems to afford it—power, the power of the people of the country as expressed in their union called National Government. For that reason, sir, those agencies of government—transportation, food, fuel, and the necessities which are kindred—will be taken by this Government in some form of control; and as the exigency of war has manifested its necessity now for our preservation. Peace, when it shall be restored, will only continue it.

Let no man in this body flatter himself that having entered on this era now of war necessity we will abandon it when the necessity of war has passed.

It may be deplored, Senators. You who are scholars of your constitutional theories of your Government may regret the departure; you may see many evils to be brought about by it, and you may deplore the fact that your Government has taken this course; but the fact will remain before you that as one of the innovations of this Government it has at last converted itself into the guardian of the citizen and that it will execute this power of guardianship to the fullest extent that shall protect that citizen, and courts will find the equity in the spirit of the Constitution to justify it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I trespass upon the attention of my friends once more?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to my friend from Utah.

Mr. KING. Do I understand my friend to be an advocate of the State socialism of Germany? And does he prefer that form of government, particularly in industrial activity, that will destroy individual initiative and place all the activities of the people under the all-dominating force of the Federal Government?

One other question: Does the Senator think that anybody, whether he be a loose constructionist of the Constitution or one who desires to destroy it, would find any justification in our form of government for turning over to the Federal Government all of the police powers of the States? And will not the doctrine to which my friend has just given his authority result in a complete destruction of our form of government and make us a monarchy or a socialism, though we may denominate ourselves a Republic?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, of course I have no control over the mind of one of my eminent colleagues that finds it agreeable to define something I say by adopting an expression such as "Prussian State socialism." I not having used the expression am unable to adopt it now as having any application, much less as a definition of the thing which I say I see my Government approaching. But one thing I say to my learned friend from Utah: You can not make a right thing wrong by giving it a wrong name. You can not take a measure made essential for the preservation of the Federal Government in time of peace or in time of war, and, by characterizing it by a name that might in itself be obnoxious to someone's sense of justice or propriety, defeat the justice of that thing.

Of course, sir, I assert that every measure of advantage has its measure of disadvantage.

If the time has come upon our Government, made necessary by the violent and lawless conduct of the lords who have taken charge of this Government in the past, and which has brought us to the necessity of taking this form of supervision over the public utilities of the Nation, then, sir, it is the necessity that has brought it about; and the action of the Government in taking charge, sir, is but another movement on the part of the Government to meet the exigency. I assure the able Senator I would not have it so if it were in my power to have prevented. I would rather, sir, this Government had continued after the order of the fathers' foundation; but I have seen that dual form of government so taken advantage of by these masters who grew powerful by virtue of it and through it by perverting it or appropriating it, that I stand as one oftentimes ready to avail myself of whatever legal power is at my hands, that I might obstruct and destroy them in their undertakings before they may obstruct and destroy my people in their life and in their liberty. I say to my friend from Utah, as I say to the Senate, this bill has been brought upon us by those who are now raising their voices against it.

Sir, it fell to my lot to deliver some casual law lectures in the law colleges in England. Out in front of the doorway of one there was a gathering of revolting citizens upon a particular occasion—touching a landlord and tenant controversy. These had preserved for themselves a text—I know not from whence it came—of strange writing; but I recall, for it burns vividly in my brain as I see it now an illuminated standard, one remarkable paragraph reading as follows:

Law lords, trade lords, and landlords! The spectres you conjured have arisen Behold, rent rebels, strikers, behold—the anarchist with his bomb, the socialist with his leveller! There they are. Ye have sown the dragon's teeth. Ye shall reap your harvest. Ye have sown the wind. Ye shall reap the whirlwind, as sure as the stream goes seaward!

If it be true, Mr. President, that these powers which this Government is daily arrogating to itself, and which in times of war find their justification in necessity, shall be continued in time of peace, it is not because we have willed it so, but because those who have brought upon the Government these distresses have made it necessary that it be so. The test is now, sir, shall the Government maintain a form that shall protect its citizen, or shall it allow a certain favored set of citizens to maintain the Government in such form as to destroy him?

This bill is here upon the theory of these necessities for the preservation of the citizen, the maintenance of the Government in this hour of peril. It is here that I justify it, both in its constitutional aspect and in its purposes. So far as I am concerned, sir, I have no excuse to offer. And, sir, so far as I shall be affected, in the future there will be no apologies in my behalf, for me, nor by me, for that which I present and the reasons which I advance. There are times, sir, when every free man must realize that he must fight, by every means in his hands, against destruction.

Sir, it may not have been discreet, but to me it seems gloriously courageous every time my mind adverts to the reply of the commanding Netherlander, when Spain commanded surrender, when his reply went forth:

"You shall not starve me, for I answer unto you, I will not surrender! Not so long as a dog barks in the street or a cat mews on the wall will we surrender because of the want of food; nay, nor so long as my left hand shall lie at the side of my body, for with my right I will draw my sword and cleaving my left feed upon it, that I might not starve while I fight for the liberty of my country."

Sir, an admirable speech; a glorious response; and while made in the extremity of that hour it characterizes the sentiment all of us will feel, that there is no extreme within the law of morals to which this Government will not go if it shall become necessary to do so to preserve the Nation against its foe, and the citizen against his enemy.

Mr. President, which way will we go? What course will this honorable body take? Senators, because some ancient construction of the Constitution is persuasive with you—because the sentiment of it allures you and calls for your further worship—shall that be the reason only that it shall be urged as an obstruction and a barrier to defeat the undertaking now before you? And when you have succeeded, my distinguished colleagues, and you behold the result—that your fellow citizen is hungry, the woman faints and famishes for food, the child is beggared, and the soldier falls in millions in death, hungered by our own hand because we were too delicate to relieve him for fear we might not rescue him in a way that commended itself to our technical conscience—what, then, will be the feeling of the human heart, when we have done such a deed? It will be mockery to justify to these that it was because of the Constitution that we found it necessary to impale them upon these spears of death.

For myself, sir, I can not accept such a justification.

This measure has some features that I wish were not appended to it. I support the main principle, and I have given my reasons. I observe at the conclusion of the measure a clause that has been introduced to serve the objects of prohibition. I would, sir, that that were not appended to this bill. I see the dangers that will invoke.

Sir, those who are opposed to prohibition will vote against the bill, however much they may favor the food-control feature, because they are opposed to the prohibition clause that is added to the bill. Those who are for prohibition, but who may not favor honestly the food provisions, will find themselves forced, out of the political situation involved, to vote for the bill despite the fact that it may contain provisions that run counter to their conscience.

This was, from my viewpoint, an unfortunate burden to be put upon this bill. I know nothing of the exigencies that called for the committee or for the House, I might add, to have put it there. I do not regard this as the time and the place for it. I would, sir, that that clause were stricken out; that hereafter this legislation, a food bill, may be a food bill and not a drink bill; and that the drink bill may be a drink bill and not a food bill; and that we may not confuse these things, to the destruction of each. I would that those in committee who made this addition could commend themselves to the Scripture that I would apply at this time—that there is a time and place for all things.

Mr. KENYON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is mistaken in that matter. The prohibition feature of the bill was originally contained in the bill introduced in the House. That left the matter to the President. The House then passed a provision for the conservation of food in that respect. The Senate Committee on Agriculture changed that provision of the House.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator. While I have that knowledge, I think my remarks were susceptible of a contrary interpretation, and that I probably spoke in a manner that did not convey my intention. I recognize that to be the history of the legislation; and with great respect to the House and not disobeying that rule which probably protects it from any comment here, I express my regret here in the Senate without regard to the source from which it came that this provision at this time is here.

Mr. President, as I said some time ago, I have imposed upon the Senate at great length, but, sir, may I interest you in the thought that every argument made by my distinguished friends who oppose my views seems to be but a repetition of arguments that have been entertained on the floor of the Senate from time to time by honest and conscientious men opposing war measures that were brought forward to execute policies that they were sincerely convinced were invading some constitutional inhibition.

Yet, sir, what has been the result of all this? Do we forget that in the Mexican War so great a soul as Abraham Lincoln condemned many of the measures for carrying it on, as did Corwin, of Ohio? Both of them were sincere, and while they opposed it before the country the result came, the Mexican War and all the benefits following which we now cherish and appropriate. Notwithstanding, we can not be blind to the fact that criticism does much to perfect that which otherwise might be crudely wrong, possibly illegal.

Sir, it will not be forgotten that in the Civil War between the States, Sumner, on the part of the Republican side, so called, and Johnson, on the part of the Democrats, both engaged in similar controversies sincerely, as to a violation of the Constitution, in nearly every move that led to the prosecution of that war. These eminent men were defeated in their opposition. The war was carried on despite their objection. It is the index directing us to the fact that our people are ever ready to take their chances with the mere infraction of technicalities when they find in such no violation of just ideals. The war was carried to a success despite these eminent Senators, sincere in their opposition.

I had the honor, sir, to come in this Chamber from time to time during the Spanish-American War proceedings while I was a Representative in the other House, and well I recall the distinguished Senator from Maine, Senator Hale, now critically ill, and we send up our prayers for his early recovery, as I listened to him and to his fellow distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, who has gone to his rest. I heard them to the full extent of their capacity condemn the measures advanced for the enforcement of the war on the ground that the measures impinged the Constitution. On this side of the Chamber at that time were Senator Daniel, of Virginia, than whom no greater or more intellectual man ever adorned a legislative chamber; Senator Morgan, of Alabama, the great; Senator Gorman, of Maryland, a master political leader. How well I recall those distinguished Senators then making the same arguments that are being made here, in many respects as many Senators are now urging constitutional objections to this bill. Yet, sir, as indicative of the spirit of the people of this country the war was carried on to a successful conclusion, and with the results which we have achieved, glorious to dwell upon. But, after all, it was the law of necessity which our Americans have realized ought to be enforced, and, with great respect to the differences urged here by these eminent statesmen and scholars of the Constitution, these distinctions of construction were ignored to achieve the final result. Now, there is no man to-day who would repeal the result because obtained by methods denounced and condemned as in violation of some theory of construction of some provision of the Constitution.

I tender these instances as a proof, sir, that in time of war the spirit of our people rises to meet the emergency that calls for action, though that action would run counter to the constitutional objection of the eminent scholars which in too many instances serves to impede progress rather than to advance it.

So, as I bring my observations to a conclusion and thank those who have done me the honor to pay attention to me, I say as said Solon when driven from his place of power, out of the gates of the Grecian city, as he turned his eyes to the structures of the classic city, he exclaimed: "Behold the monuments of greatness built by that I fight for and for which now I am condemned." So say I, behold! There is Cuba, liberated and freed, its people joyous and happy. The redeemed island entwining her national colors with our Stars and Stripes and making tender of her sons in the cause of liberty and justice which we have marched into the world to achieve.

China, which had violated the rights of Americans and had been punished by America, received at our hands the return of money imposed as our indemnity, and with a specific injunction that it shall be used for the education of their children. Both measures, the advance on China with the European nations to protect missionaries and the return of the indemnity, were condemned as being improper and in violation of the constitutional spirit of our country. Lately China has waked up, and with so small a sphere of governmental intelligence, with her vast area of land and her countless millions is turned from being an enemy into such friendship that in this hour we find her our friend, and at a time when we not only need her for our service but may need her later for eventualities that no man can fail to see the shadow of suspended over the Pacific. There, too, are the Philippines—this island empire—rescued from oppression and restored by our generous justice to its own children. There in the distant seas they sit in the smile of content and in the dignity of independence. Their people blessing our nobility and their sons pledging their lives at our call to uphold us in honor and glory in every part of the world.

There are Haiti and San Domingo and Panama in our own continent, those little countries to which we gave liberty, justice, and homogeneous government. There they are presenting to us a government for the first time representing a high civilization though possessed by us in a control assailed as unconstitutional. I tender these as the fruits to demonstrate that the American Republic will not violate the spirit of justice and that we ever hold in check, even the temptation of wrong, with the power of the people at the ballot box. There are other powers of restraint not to be forgotten. There is that ever-present ambition, the hope of a man for holding office of trust with honor; whatever may be the cause of his obedience and regard to his countrymen the fact remains that these redeemed and rescued lands are the monuments which we, like the old lawgiver of Greece, can say, "Behold, these are they which have been constructed by these deeds which were, as is this now proposed, condemned."

Mr. President, I have done. I have presented, sir, my views. I have presented them from the fullness of my convictions. Sir, I have set forth wherein I feel this measure is justified and wherein it is called for. I respect the sincerity that marks the opposition by the eminent men whose great ability guiding the assault is not only a test of the measure but to which I have ever paid tribute wherever possible. Yet while they are sincere and they are just, I can not follow them, because I behold my course to be straight to the point to be achieved in behalf of my country—success. I can not pause upon the lesser consideration of the little devious contours of the route through which I must be invited only to be lost in the confusion. To me the great object is that we shall win this war, preserve our soldiers from hunger, and strike down any who would starve our citizens. That speedily we bring our country to the very highest mark of efficiency in action and victory at the end. Mr. President, classical history informs us that in the shadowed fastnesses of Rome, where were assembled the contestants for the kingship of the world, there appeared the seer, who cried out that he who shall first kiss his mother shall be king of the world. Then, as if stumbling, the ancient Brutus fell to the earth and kissed the soil to attest that his native land was the mother, first and of all, of men and kings. There he vowed anew his devotion to her as he took his oath as the newly anointed king of all. To-day, here in this sacred Hall, we our country's Representatives, fall to the feet of our ancient mother and kiss her sacred soil as we tender anew our rekindled vow, pledging long live America; death to her destroyers, at home or abroad. [Applause.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I only want to take a few moments this afternoon. Strange logic we have just heard. The United States, we are told, has achieved success. Therefore we ought to disregard the Constitution. The claim that the United States because it has progressed has progressed because of violations of the Constitution is the substance of the latter part of the distinguished Senator's argument. If it did not mean that, I could not discern its meaning.

Just what the war with Mexico or the war with Spain may have to do with the present question is hard to conceive. It is true that there have been men at all stages of our country's history who have protested that certain things attempted to be done were violative of the Constitution. It is true that in some instances those men have been declared to be wrong, whereas in the vast majority of instances they have been right. So well has the Constitution been devised that although 128 years have passed since its adoption the old Constitution still exists, still lives, and has its great and wonderful mission to perform. I am confident it will withstand the most recent assaults of the new apostles of reform.

I have no patience with a Senator who declares that the Constitution does not exist. I ask him how he got here himself if he did not come under the Constitution? Whence came his powers? By what authority does he presume to speak and for whom?

There are but two sources of power that have ever been asserted for government. One is from God, the other is from the people. The people in this country said, "We are the source of power." The people adopted their Constitution. The people by their Constitution bound and circumscribed the powers of the agents they created out of nothing. In Prussia they say God is the source of power. Now he who denies that he serves here under the Constitution must take his stand beside William of Prussia and assert he gets his authority from the only other source of power ever asserted. Accordingly, he must connect himself with Divinity.

I shall not at present further pursue this theme. I hold the Senator from Illinois in such regard that I intend waiting until Monday morning in order that I may not in replying employ the language of haste. But I desire to call attention to one thing. The Senator grew very dramatic. As he described the starving people of the land his voice fell into the plaintive tones of hopeless pathos. As he described the villains who wrest the food from hungry mouths, it rose in that wonderful crescendo which he employs to express the cyclones of his passion. But that was mere rhetorical fervor—no one has a keener sense of logic and of fact than my good friend. When these are lacking, his manners bridge the chasm.

Now, what are the plain facts lying before our eyes? Last year there was a shortage in the potato crop. The wheat crop was somewhat below the average in our country. There was likewise a great world shortage. The allies came to our country and bought in enormous quantities. It is now admitted it was the allies who ran a corner upon our foodstuffs. This corner about four weeks ago reached its greatest force, and prices were for a short time run to a very high point. Yet what do the cold figures show during the period of 14 months just passed? We for 12 months of that time obtained our food cheaper than they did in England. I have proved that from the figures, and nobody has disputed the accuracy of my statements.

Our flour averaged cheaper for the whole 14 months, including those when the corner existed, than they did in England on the average for the same period. But we had two months of excessive prices, principally caused by the allies.

I said two or three weeks ago if you would give nature a chance, if you would wait a little bit and let the farmer and nature and the law of supply and demand operate, you would find relief.

Now, what are the facts? Without the benefit of anybody's tinkering, without any violations of the Constitution or of the laws of trade or the rights of man, just by letting things take their usual course, you find that the price of potatoes in about four or five days time has gone from $12 a barrel to $4 a barrel. Oh, if the food dictator had only been appointed and this had happened they would have been wreathing garlands for his brow for 100 years! But the choicest of all the garlands would have been the one that would have forever kept green and fragrant, that one created by the magical lips and magical words of my magical friend from Illinois.

Just to preserve some plain printed facts I will read from the Washington Times of to-night, June 30:

POTATO PRICE DROPS ANOTHER 50 CENTS—ONIONS, CABBAGE, AND OTHER VEGETABLES HIT MARKET TOBOGGAN.

Another decline of 50 cents a barrel in the wholesale price of potatoes brought the figure down to from $4 to $5.50 a barrel to-day.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator permit me at this juncture while he is upon onions and potatoes to remind him that I have not had a bite to eat, and I wish to leave the Chamber for a few moments? I shall return presently to this inviting feast.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will enjoy his dinner as much as I enjoyed the Senator's remarks. [Laughter.] I read:

Another decline of 50 cents a barrel in the wholesale price of potatoes brought the figure down to from $4 to $5.50 a barrel to-day—

It means running between those two prices.

Yesterday's price was from $4.50 to $6. The price has dropped $1.50 in two days—

If it keeps on at the rate in three days more the price of potatoes will be at zero.

Dealers said there are about 1,600 barrels of potatoes on hand, or three times as much as last Tuesday. Poor families again are using potatoes in quantities after an abstinence of several months.
The bottom has dropped out of the onion market. Onions which sold as high as 20 cents a quarter of a peck a few weeks ago, now are selling less than half of that—

Wait now for about two weeks, and they will be selling for a good deal less than one-half. The crop has not begun to come in here, except in a limited number of articles.

The volume of green vegetables arriving hourly is forcing prices down. String beans have dropped $3 a barrel in the last 10 days. Cabbage has declined from $5 to $7 a barrel, as compared with prices 10 days ago. All other vegetables are dropping proportionately.

Oh, I wish I could get the Senate of the United States to not lose its head and legislate permanently because there is a temporary condition. We got into a furor about the price of flour. I could cumber the RECORD by repeating the utterances that were made here by Senators. A Senator stood on this floor less than 15 days ago and asserted that we were going to starve in this country. He asserted that flour was going to $20 a barrel. It was asserted that we must send Government employees to the Pacific Ocean and get fish and bring them back here to keep the East from starving. We were told about a wonderful experiment that had been had in the matter of hauling fish to this part of the world from the Pacific Ocean; how it was necessary to ransack the sea and the land and the air to keep us from starving to death. When they told us about those fish they just forgot to tell us that 60 per cent of the last cargo that was brought rotted and went to waste. They did now know that the experiment ended like most of such experiments. Before these gentlemen have finished discussing this bill we find that instead of flour having gone to $20 a barrel, that the flour that sold on the 14th of May for $15.65 was selling yesterday for $12.25. That is the highest quality. The lower grades of flour were sold much lower than that. It was $15.65 on May 14, and was $12.25 yesterday, a difference already of over 25 per cent, and the new wheat is not yet in the market.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is overlooking one of the virtues of the bill. If the prices get sufficiently low then the guaranty part of the bill will operate.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; we will come to the guaranty part after a while. Mr. President, prices are likely to be sufficiently low. I talked with a distinguished Senator who represents a great grain State, and I hope he will make the statement on this floor who tells me that the advices that he has from his State to-day are that there is no market for wheat. Fortunately the wheat from his State has not been harvested, but for the left-over wheat there is no market. He tells me no arrangement can be made up to this time for financing the new crop. You can not sell it in advance of the harvest. Boards of trade are largely closed. The markets are gone.

Keep on with this foolish conduct, interfere with the laws of trade and commerce, and you will discover that the man you first injure is the American farmer, and you will learn that after you have injured the American farmer and frightened him you have helped to destroy the very man you must call on to feed the world. Make no mistake about it. Just bring yourselves down to a little plain, common-sense reasoning and apply these proposed regulations to yourselves. It is common to think that somehow the farmer does not have any business judgment or business sense, but he does.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator understand that we have been in receipt of news of the sort that came from Virginia the other day, the result of which is that two gentlemen are going from Washington to Virginia to find out why the people there do not dig their potatoes?

Mr. REED. Yes; I read that. I will come to that in a moment. I thank the Senator.

Suppose you were a manufacturer and suppose there was a great demand for your product in the world market, and suppose it was necessary for the public good that you should double your factory, and being a man of just ordinary and reasonable patriotism you desired to serve your country and was about to double the size of your factory. Then suppose that Congress should propose to write a law that would provide that you would have to sell your products for what some gentleman you never saw or heard of before might fix. Would you build that factory or would you wait?

Do not make any mistake. The farmers of this country have just as much sense as anybody else. They know that at best they have chances to take that the business man escapes. The farmer has to take the chance of enough rain and enough sunshine and of not too much of either. He must take the chance of all the inclemencies of the weather. He must take the chance of all the pests that eat up that which he seeks to produce. And when he gets through that the farmer has to take the chance of the market.

Somebody said the other day with a good deal of truth he does not make the market in which he buys or the market in which he sells. But if you allow him to sell in the world market he can judge something of what that will be. If you will allow him to buy in the world market he can judge something of what that means, but if you compel him to buy in the world's competitive market where every man in the world bids against him and at the same time give him only what some one Government-appointed individual may say he can have, that farmer is in a position where he can not tell whether he dare plant or not.

It is said that a minimum price will be fixed. The farmer certainly does not know to-day what that minimum price will be, and the farmer can not tell when the minimum price is fixed for him next year whether it is going to be high enough to warrant him in planting a crop or not, unless it is fixed outrageously high.

This is true, because the farmer can not tell whether he will raise a good crop or a poor crop, and he must be guaranteed against the poor crop. If there is a general crop shortage and the farmer is allowed to sell in an open and uncontrolled market, then, although his crop may be only half of an average crop, the price he can obtain makes him hold; but if he is forced to sell at a particular price, then, unless that price is so high as to take into consideration a partial crop failure, with attendant high prices, a general crop shortage in the country might result in a general bankruptcy of the farmers of the country.

Again, the farmer does not know whether the price of fertilizers will be 600 per cent higher than it is in normal times or 1,200 per cent higher. He does not know what harness, shoes, agricultural implements, clothing, and all other articles he must buy will cost. He does know their price is fixed by world conditions, and that they are likely to go to a tremendous level, but he also knows that the things he raises will not be permitted to go to that level but will be arbitrarily controlled in their price.

It is true the bill does give the power to control the cost of many manufactured articles, but we all know that up to this date there has not been the slightest indication that any such power will ever be exercised.

The farmer can not tell what labor will cost him; nobody will guarantee him that the cost of labor will not rise; nobody will guarantee him that the price of shoes will not go up; nobody will guarantee him that the price of agricultural implements will not go up; nobody will guarantee him that fertilizers will not go up. The only thing that is really guaranteed him is that his free world market is to be taken away from him and that the prices of his products are to be artificially controlled.

If you do not put it high enough to cover every contingency, he may not plant, and if you put it high enough to cover every contingency the probabilities are that you will rob every consumer in the country. The old Populist was laughed at because it was said that he tried to pick himself up by his bootstraps and lift himself over the fence. He was going, according to the satirists who dealt with him, to make money out of nothing. A similar argument is being made for this bill. American people are told that it is going to increase the profits of the farmer, and you try to make the farmer believe that; and that it is at the same time going to reduce the prices to the consumer, and you try to make the consumer believe that. Every man knows that both of those things can not be true.

My friend who is down getting his dinner, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], talked about the man who gathers in the food and what he would do to him. Again I ask, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has asked day after day, Why it is that the House of Representatives, why it is that the administration, does not permit the bill to become a law, which we passed, which provides for controlling speculation in this country and for punishing forestalling of the market and the hoarding of food?

Mr. KENYON. I think I ought to state to the Senator from Missouri, in fairness, that the House of Representatives on yesterday appointed conferees on that bill about the time the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was speaking, and the conferees met to-day.

Mr. REED. Very well; but they have been a long time in appointing conferees; and we know why that bill has been held up. I hope the conferees will do something and bring in that bill, so that we need not go into heroics about this food question any longer.

The Senator from New York called attention to the fact, and we were told, Mr. President, that little boys—Boy Scouts, splendid little fellows—had been mobilized in great numbers and taken down in Virginia to dig the farmers' potatoes. Every man who had been raised on a farm, as I was, knew about how that would turn out before it started, for I have seen the individual come from town to work on a farm, with his soft hands and his city ways—a splendid, good fellow—but it takes about six months' time to acclimate him, to get him so that he can stay out in the sun, and so that he can work; and long before that six months' time has come around he has gone back to the city. But these little boys came down to the farmers of Virginia, the market on potatoes broke, and the farmers quit digging their potatoes. Now, we are informed by the press—and Heaven save me from ever challenging anything I see in the press—that Mr. Hoover is sending down there to find out how those farmers came to do that, and why they did it. I wonder what will happen when he finds out that a farmer actually quit selling his potatoes—a Virginia farmer—because he could not get enough to pay him for them. I do not know what would happen in Virginia, but judging by the amiable qualities of the Senators who represent that State here, I imagine that the individual who presses that investigation too far will be conducted quietly, but firmly, to a stake-and-rider fence, dumped over into the public highway, and started for Washington.

The truth is that already you are destroying the farmers' market in this country. That is what I want to impress. You are upsetting things; you are mussing things up. I repeat, for about the fortieth time—and I intend to keep on repeating, as old Cato repeated "Carthage must be destroyed"—that the American people can attend to their business better than Congress can attend to it for them; better than Mr. Hoover can attend to it for them; better even than the President of the United States can attend to it for them. Therefore the heroics of my friend from Illinois need not disturb anybody on this question of food prices. If you will wait 30 days you will find that the food prices will be so low that you will be wanting to boost them up and that the shoe will be on the other foot.

Mr. President, there is one thing that the Senator from Illinois said which I want to call attention to this evening. I intend to have something to say about the law of this matter, but not to-night. The Senator from Illinois said, in substance and effect, that we were brushing aside the Constitution; that we were centralizing all power here in Washington; that here we were establishing a complete and absolute control of the affairs of the people of the United States, and that the power being now taken over by this bill for war times would be perpetuated in times of peace. If an opponent of this measure as it now stands were to make that assertion it might not be much believed, but, Mr. President, when the Senator, who seems to be selected and put forward to defend this bill, tells us that he can only defend it upon the ground that the Constitution is being brushed aside, and tells us that the powers we are now asserting in times of war will be asserted in times of peace, it is high time that Senators paused to consider what they are doing.

What are the powers of this bill that the Senator says will be employed and perpetuated in times of peace? The bill, even in its present modified form, gives the right to the President of the United States, whenever he shall desire so to do, by simple proclamation to forbid any man engaging in a number of the great businesses of the United States, from proceeding with his business unless he proceeds under a license. Mr. President, if that power is exercised in times of peace, the dream of Karl Marx has come true; socialism is fastened upon this Republic. And the distinguished Senator from Illinois, who is put forward to defend this bill, tells us that that is to be our fate; and that, Mr. President, as suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is not in fact the socialism of Karl Marx, but it is something worse; it is imperial socialism. Is it not time when such remarkable statements are made upon the floor of the Senate to pause and consider?

Mr. President, I say here is the line of difference between us. I think I can state it fairly. All of us want to win the war; all of us are willing to do anything that is necessary to win the war. Some of us believe that the best way to win this war is to allow business to go on uninterruptedly and the Constitution of the United States to remain in full force and vigor and to do nothing violative of that instrument or of the rights of the people. There are others who believe that the Government should engage in a great many activities and, generally speaking, take control of business, and who yet believe that can be done within the Constitution. I have no special quarrel with those men. I simply do not agree with them that it is necessary or right to do these things. Some of those things I believe to be prohibited by the Constitution, and I believe that we weaken ourselves when we invade that instrument. I myself shall never consent to invading it when I know that I am doing so.

But that point of difference is quite unlike that which is raised by the man who stands upon the floor of the Senate and asserts, as has been asserted now by a number of Senators, that the Constitution of the United States is suspended during the war, or that the Constitution of the United States may be brushed aside by the will of the Government whenever a few men occupying temporary positions see fit to brush it aside. It is against these latter two doctrines that I want to have something to say in the near future. I do not care, however, Mr. President, to go on to-night, and I hope the Senate can adjourn. This is Saturday afternoon. What says the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I had hoped it might be possible to proceed to vote on some of the amendments of this bill. Has the Senator from Missouri concluded his remarks?

Mr. REED. I can in five minutes make a statement in regard to another matter, but later I want to go on in connection with what I said in regard to the fixing of prices. Then I should like to have the Senate adjourn, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Very well.

Mr. REED. The other thing that I desire to say is this: We were told some weeks ago that the country was on the verge of starvation; that there were lines of people at soup houses; that there had been bread riots. I remember two or three Senators spoke of that. So, Mr. President, I wrote to the mayors of some 30 or 40 cities, selected indiscriminately, throughout this country, and I have their letters, which I intend to digest and to epitomize and to put into the RECORD in the digested form for I do not wish to cumber the RECORD with the entire statement. Mr. President, without a single exception, save one, these mayors of cities report that labor is better employed than it was in 1914, the year immediately preceding the war; they report that labor is being much better paid than it was in 1914; they report that the number of persons unemployed is much less than it was in 1914; and in many instances the statement is that labor in sufficient amounts can not be obtained at all.

They report, almost without exception, that a less number of people are being supported by charity than in 1914; and in every single instance, where specific figures are given, it is shown that there is a falling off of substantially 50 per cent in the number of people who are being supported by public charity.

Nearly all of the mayors complain of the high cost of living, and yet in every instance, with the exception, I believe, of one case, of which I shall speak in a moment, it is shown by the statement of facts which they give that the people are much better off than they were in 1914. The one case to which I refer was a town in Alabama, where they had suffered by reason of the destruction of their crops, and there had been great local disturbances that had brought hard times to that one city.

So that, Mr. President, this cry which has been going up about starvation in this land is a false and foolish cry. Substantially all of these mayors replied by saying that there is always a class of people who can not quite support themselves, some of them through sickness, some of them through other misfortunes; but that that number is as great to-day as it was in 1914 is undoubtedly not the case.

So I think we should proceed in this matter with the understanding that the whole problem that we have before us is to deal with the war situation. Let us do so with cool heads, and let us deal with facts, not fancies; truth not imaginings.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m., Saturday, June 30, 1917) the Senate took a recess until Monday, July 2, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 30, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art supremely great and glorious, infinite in all Thine attributes, impart unto us that uplift of the spirit which shall strengthen our grip upon the things that make for righteousness and which shall broaden our views of life and its far-reaching purposes; that we may go forward to larger achievements in the things whereunto Thou hast called us; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever; amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL FRIDAY, JULY 6, 1917.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday next, it adjourn to meet the following Friday, July 6, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday next it adjourn to meet on the succeeding Friday at 12 o'clock noon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL MONDAY, JULY 9.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Friday next it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on the following Monday, July 9, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Friday next, it adjourn to meet on the following Monday at 12 o'clock noon. Is there objection?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the food bill should pass the Senate in the meantime and should come here at any time when we meet, will it be taken up and sent to conference?

Mr. KITCHIN. It would not be taken up for consideration, but Mr. LEVER will ask unanimous consent to send it to conference.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is what I say.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the conferees will be considering the matter in the meantime.

Mr. KINCHELOE. And if unanimous consent is refused——

Mr. KITCHIN. If unanimous consent is refused, I imagine the gentlemen to be appointed conferees will get together informally in the meantime so that they will be able to agree quickly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Friday next it adjourn to meet the succeeding Monday at noon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bills H. R. 3650 and H. R. 4467, to amend the act to regulate commerce, be laid on the table, being similar to the two Senate bills, S. 2356 and S. 1816, which were passed yesterday and on Wednesday last.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVE FROM ASSESSMENT WORK ON ACCOUNT OF MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 4091) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children be laid on the table, a similar Senate bill (S. 1811) having been passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD a discussion by Judge Clearwater, of New York, upon the effort to enforce involuntary retirements of circuit and district judges by presidential decree.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. KEHOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a memorial to the Congress of the United States from the State of Florida respecting Choctawhatchee Reservation in west Florida.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3548. An act providing for the modification of the designs of the current quarter dollar.

NIAGARA RIVER WATER POWER.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on Senate joint resolution 13, extending the time within which the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River shall remain in effect, and I ask unanimous consent to consider it at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia presents a conference report and asks unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, the rule about printing to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 91).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River" shall remain in effect, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to Senate joint resolution No. 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by the amendment of the House to said Senate joint resolution No. 13 insert the following:

"That public resolution No. 45 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, approved January 19, 1917, entitled 'Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River,' is continued in full force and effect and under the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations until July 1, 1918: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to make a comprehensive and thorough investigation, including all necessary surveys and maps, of the entire subject of water diversion from the Great Lakes and the Niagara River, including navigation, sanitary and power purposes, and the preservation of the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls and the rapids of Niagara River, and to report to Congress thereon at the earliest practicable date. To carry out the provisions of this proviso, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000."

And the House agree to the same.

H. D. FLOOD,
W. S. GOODWIN,
Managers on the part of the House.
M. A. SMITH,
JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the Senate joint resolution No. 13 entitled "Joint resolution extending the time within which the 'joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River' shall remain in effect," submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to said amendment. The resolution as finally agreed upon is as follows:

"That public resolution No. 45 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, approved January 19, 1917, entitled 'Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River,' is continued in full force and effect, and under the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations, until July 1, 1918: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to make a comprehensive and thorough investigation, including all necessary surveys and maps, of the entire subject of water diversion from the Great Lakes and the Niagara River, including navigation, sanitary, and power purposes, and the preservation of the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls and the rapids of Niagara River, and to report to Congress thereon at the earliest practicable date. To carry out the provisions of this proviso, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000."

H. D. FLOOD,
W. S. GOODWIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the conference report eliminates every "tooth" that was in the House joint resolution with one exception. It retains the provision appropriating money for an investigation by the Secretary of War. Aside from that, the gentlemen who control the water-power monopoly at Niagara have achieved a complete victory. The situation is a peculiar one. By making a point of no quorum this matter could be forced over until the 9th day of July next.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. This resolution does not make any permanent law, other than to extend the rights for one year.

Mr. KEATING. No; and that is all that the monopolists at Niagara want. They do not want permanent law, unless they can write the permanent law. What they want is to continue to receive these temporary permits, which will permit them to go on using this water power without any restriction whatsoever; and so long as the House tolerates that sort of thing you are not going to have any permanent legislation on the water-power situation at Niagara Falls or elsewhere. As I said before, this one "tooth" has been retained in the joint resolution. The Secretary of War is given $25,000 and authority to conduct an investigation of the entire subject and report back to Congress. I have sufficient confidence in the Secretary of War to feel that he will submit a report before this subject is brought before us again, and that that report will serve to arouse public sentiment in this country concerning the situation at Niagara.

I confess that if the point of no quorum would serve to check this proposition for any considerable length of time I would not hesitate to make it. I will not make it this morning, because I feel that to do so would simply complicate the situation for a few days and not accomplish any good.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The report has not been printed, but I gather from what the gentleman stated he has read the report. I would like to inquire whether or not there is a time limit within which the Secretary of War must make this investigation and report to Congress?

Mr. KEATING. I forget the exact point about the limit——

Mr. FLOOD. It is "as soon as practicable." We could not make a time limit, I will say to the gentleman, because the engineers might be engaged in matters connected with the war; but they think they can do it by the next session of Congress.

Mr. KEATING. If possible, the Secretary of War will report in that time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They assume that unless something unexpected should turn up they can complete the investigation within six months or a year.

Mr. KEATING. That is my understanding. I know the Secretary of War will act in perfect good faith.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is the disposition of the Chief of Engineers to expedite this investigation.

Mr. KEATING. That is my understanding.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to suggest to the gentleman that I have in mind as early as possible to try to secure a line of conferences between the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Committee on the Public Lands, which has jurisdiction of water power on public lands, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with a view of harmonizing on some general law that will govern the subjects within the jurisdiction of those three committees.

Mr. KEATING. Of course, I fully commend the suggestion, but I would also suggest to the gentleman that he do something to raise the blockade in another part of this Capitol—a blockade which has been encouraged by the men who are profiting from this water-power monopoly. This House has gone on record and may be depended upon to continue to go on record in the right way on the water-power question. So it is not sufficient to harmonize the committees of this House. The gentleman must be prepared to harmonize elsewhere.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the only way I have seen it possible to harmonize them was to yield, and I could not do that for two reasons. First, to a good many of their contentions I personally objected; and, secondly, this House objected to all of them.

Mr. KEATING. That is right.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Hr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I applaud what the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has said. I glory in his spunk. I am proud that he has got the backbone to stand for what is right in water-power legislation, and I hope that his arm will never grow weaker. I hope there will be more strength to his elbow, and I want to assure him that as long as I am in the House I will support him in the wise and well-considered position which he has taken in reference to this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to vote for the adoption of the conference report. I shall not advise anyone to vote against it. It seems to be a matter that requires prompt action, but I am reserving to myself the right to vote against it as a matter of principle, because it seems to me to be a situation that we ought not to give way to just at this time.

I do not intend to take up the time of the House to discuss the Niagara power question at any length, but I want to refer to one feature of it alone and that is the connection of the Aluminum Co. of America with the Niagara power situation. The Aluminum Co. of America gets 80,000 horsepower of the electric power that is developed at Niagara Falls. That concern gets the benefit of about one-third of all the power that is generated there. I want to call attention to that company and the methods which it follows in doing business so that people may have some idea as to whom this valuable power is being donated.

The Aluminum Co. is paying something for power, but is paying it to concerns that are themselves taking it without any right from the Government. The Hydraulic Power Co. acquired or built, many years ago, a canal by which the water is diverted. It also owns penstocks, tubes through which the water falls, and some turbines at the bottom of those penstocks on which turbines the water falls. Those turbines are geared onto the generating machinery of the Aluminum Co. So that so far as the Aluminum Co. is concerned the Hydraulic Power Co. does not generate electric current, but merely sells mechanical power taken directly from their turbines. For the privilege of using this mechanical power the Aluminum Co. pays the Hydraulic Power Co. an average price of about $10 a horsepower annually, which means that since they get some seventy thousand and odd horsepower in that way they pay to the Hydraulic Power Co. between $700,000 and $800,000, as nearly as I can estimate, each year for the privilege of using the power.

The Federal Government gives the water to the Hydraulic Power Co. They graciously allow it to flow down their canal and through their penstocks and to fall on their turbines, and that is the end of their connection with it, and for that they are able to draw down the modest little sum of between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars a year from the Aluminum Co.

But that is a mere incident to this game. The Aluminum Co. is a Pennsylvania corporation. It was organized about 1890, roughly, and operated first in Pittsburgh. It had a capitalization of $1,000,000, of which a considerable portion, said by some to be about $600,000 was paid in patents of doubtful validity. The remainder, $400,000, was paid in cash.

The capital stock of that concern has been increased from time to time by stock dividends, and one and another of the methods best known to high finance, until at present it is $20,000,000. But of all that amount there has been, so far as the committee can learn from the testimony, only about $2,500,000 in actual money paid in. The balance represents undistributed profits, the earnings of the company that have been laid aside. But in the meantime the company has accumulated in profits and assets of all kinds somewhere between eighty and ninety millions of dollars. In this brief time of less than 25 years the Aluminum Co., on an investment of not more than $2,500,000, has been able to accumulate over $80,000,000 in assets, and has issued dividends nearly every year, sometimes as high as 10 per cent, on this inflated capitalization. Last year they made net earnings of $20,000,000, and issued to each stockholder a 100 per cent dividend on his stock, and other amounts went into betterments.

Now, the recital of this concern's history that I have made in itself proves all that I am going to say, which is that the Aluminum Co. is an unjust, oppressive, and intolerable monopoly, and is shamelessly exploiting the American people in its operations. That follows as a matter of course.

I will undertake to trace their operations to a slight extent. The fact is that this concern enjoys an entire and complete monopoly in the Western Hemisphere in the manufacturing and production of aluminum. There is not an ounce of aluminum produced in the Western Hemisphere that is not produced by this concern. They have a subsidiary company which operates a plant in Canada. We are forced to take aluminum at whatever price they choose to charge for it.

We interrogated Mr. Davis, the president of that company, at considerable length as to what it costs to produce this metal. He was very diplomatic and modestly pleaded with us not to press him too hard, and we were generous; we did not press him. We did not make him tell; but he gave out a little information, and from that information various members of the committee have computed that the cost to this concern of producing this material in ingots ranges somewhere from 8 to 14 cents per pound—not above the latter figure. During last year this concern sold aluminum for as high as 63 cents in this country, and not only that, but sold it to the United States Government for that price of 63 cents a pound. That is not the uniform price. The president of the company tells us they only get 35 or 37 cents a pound, on the average, for it. But we must indulge the imagination somewhat upon that point.

The president of the aluminum company has recently received an honor; he has been made chairman of the subcommittee on aluminum of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense. The president of the aluminum company and a fabricator of aluminum, a manufacturer who is compelled to look to Mr. Davis for his supply of raw material, and a broker in metals—that is, three men—comprise the subcommittee on aluminum. Mr. Davis and his committee have gone over the matter carefully, and, exercising the very greatest forbearance, they have finally fixed a price of 27½ cents per pound for the vast quantity of aluminum that the Government will require in the course of the war. They feel that they have done a magnanimous and patriotic act in fixing that price of 27½ cents upon metal that could not possibly cost to produce, according to any reasonable opinion our committee could form, exceeding 14 cents. And they feel in a good humor with themselves about this. They might just as well have said 40 cents.

The Government has got to have this metal. It is very important. You can hardly carry on the war without it. Millions and millions of pounds are going to be consumed. This aluminum company is in position to take the Government by the throat and force it to pay whatever price it chooses to fix for this material. It is a generous act when the highwayman takes only half instead of all that his victim had in his pocket. It is splendid.

Now, if we are going to stand for this kind of thing, if we are going to allow the Government to be held up by these war contractors who bellowed so loudly for war and wanted it so much—and the reason why they wanted it now being disclosed—if we are going to allow the Government to be held up, I do not know anything better that we could do than to trust to the generosity of these gentlemen and to adopt the conference report and to carry the matter on in the way that it has been carried on. But, oh, I wish we had a Congress and officials that had some backbone. [Applause.] I wish we had somebody who would refuse to stand for any such holdups as these that are being perpetrated. I wish that the American Congress and those who are in executive positions would refuse to submit to any such highwaying in this time of our Nation's peril. It is not going on alone in aluminum, but it is going on all down the line. There never was a more wise provision of law proposed than that amendment which is to be brought forward in the Senate to the food-control bill, which will, at least, bar these fellows off the advisory committee of the Council of National Defense. I applaud that amendment, and I trust that it may become a part of the law that the body is considering at the other end of the Capitol.

Now, then, I say I wish we had backbone enough and those in authority had backbone enough to take over the entire Niagara power situation [applause]—to take it over for operation by the Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. To take over this aluminum plant and to make this material that we have got to have in order to carry on this war by the Government itself. Why should we submit to such practices? Why should we allow "captains of industry" to heap up swollen fortunes out of the misfortunes of our people and our Nation?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman whether the action of the administration in placing as its chief adviser on the subcommittee as to the purchase of aluminum a representative of the industry itself; whether that is not entirely in harmony with its general policy of placing at the head of each subcommittee of the advisory committee on the purchase of an article the men who are the head of the industry and interested in the sale?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say to the gentleman that I do not know what the administration has had to do with that matter of subcommittees. I understand that there is a Mr. Clark, of Cleveland, who is at the head of the munitions board, or something of that kind, and that he has appointed other subcommittees, of one of which Mr. Baruch is chairman, and that Mr. Baruch has selected Mr. Davis and Mr. Peabody and Mr. So-and-So, other captains of industry, to head different subcommittees, but what the administration or the Congress has had to do with that I do not know, and I do not know what we can have to do with it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say that in each instance where I have come in contact with the workings of that committee I have found that the men who have goods to sell are represented on the subcommittees as advisers as to the purchase of those goods.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. What is there to prevent the President from taking over this aluminum establishment under the legislation previously passed by Congress, even though we pass this resolution? I take it that this resolution is now under consideration from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. What is to preclude the President under the previous legislation from taking over this aluminum establishment if he finds it necessary to do so?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to have somebody more familiar with the subject than I am to answer that question.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman mentioned an individual by the name of Baruch. That can not be the Bernard Baruch who was the leading beneficiary of a more or less notorious leak a few months ago, can it? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am not personally acquainted with that gentleman, and I am unable to give the gentleman from Nebraska the information. [Laughter.]

We ought to have some settled policy with reference to the Niagara situation. We have dragged along here and veered like a weathercock from corner to corner, until we have wasted years, and in the meantime the rights of the people have gone neglected. This valuable water power is being used without the public to which it belongs getting any benefit from it. We ought to adopt some definite policy with reference to it; and I take it that we are taking a step in that direction when we provide for this investigation required by the resolution. I believe that the investigation will show that the present methods of developing that water power are wasteful and inefficient, and that the whole establishment up there will have to go into the discard. I think that the power of Niagara ought to be developed by some public commission. Public interest in the State of New York is rapidly waking up. A bill has recently been introduced in the New York Senate to create a State commission something like the Ontario Power Commission. I hope that bill may be passed at an early date. Its enactment into law will demonstrate the wisdom and patriotism of the Legislature of New York. A public commission should develop Niagara with an eye single to the public interest, to the interest of the whole people to which Niagara rightfully belongs. It should be taken away from the selfish exploiters who use it for the purposes of monopoly for oppression and extortion.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

EXEMPTIONS OF THE COOPERATIVE FARMERS' ORGANIZATIONS.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I rise to call attention to an amendment placed upon the food-control bill in another body. That amendment provides exemptions of the cooperative farmers' organizations of this country, so that while the bill would give the President power to commandeer all the wheat in a privately owned elevator in Buffalo or Chicago, he can not do this in the elevators owned by the cooperative farmers of this country. If this amendment is made a part of the law it will practically vitiate the power to control our food during the war.

I want to say that I do not believe the farmers of this country, as an organization or as individuals, have asked that anything of this kind be done. I believe that the farmers of this country are more honest, more patriotic than to ask that an amendment be put into this bill for the purpose of exempting them from its control.

Now, these farm organizations have about 3,800 wheat elevators. They do about half a billion dollars' worth of business a year. They can store in those elevators over 50,000,000 bushels of wheat, and if they are exempt they will, therefore, control under that exemption, without let or hindrance from the Government under the food-control bill, about one-ninth of the total amount of our wheat crop last year. More than this, they control the sale of more than one-half of our grain.

If that amendment should pass the other body, I hope that the Members of this House will not stand for any such exemption. Day after day amendments or bills have been brought before the Congress of the United States requesting exemption for this and that class, so that, finally, if we go on with this process of exemption, there will be few left upon whom we can place the burden of this great emergency.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is all that I have to say upon that subject at this time, but if that amendment comes into this House there will be something more said, and I hope that my colleagues will join me in an attempt to prevent this amendment going into this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I will include in the RECORD a letter from an official of the Department of Agriculture dealing with cooperative farm organizations, and a table showing the vast extent to which they control our food supply.

Following are the letter and table referred to:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF MARKETS AND RURAL ORGANIZATION,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1917.

Hon. E. R. BATHRICK,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BATHRICK: Pursuant to your conversation over the telephone yesterday morning with Mr. John R. Huhmphrey, investigator in market business practice of this office, regarding cooperative organizations and their importance in handling the food supply of the country, I am pleased to give you the following information:

The estimated number of farmers' elevators in the United States at the present time is about 3,800, most of which are situated in nine States, as follows: North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio.

During the early period of construction of farmers' elevators the average capacity was from 10,000 to 15,000 bushels, but the trend during the past five years has been toward larger houses, ranging from 25,000 to 40,000 bushels in capacity. A recent publication of the Agricultural Experiment Station of Minnesota gives the average capacity of elevators in that State as 22,500 bushels, but as Minnesota did not enter the cooperative field in this particular line of business until comparatively recent years, it is a fair estimate to say that the average capacity of farm elevators in the United States is about 18,000 bushels.

The storage records of elevators in Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota will sometimes show a total of as much as 100,000 bushels as being in store, whereas in reality there may be but a few thousand bushels actually in the bins. This condition in the records is brought about by the fact that grain stored by farmers is shipped out by the elevator and sold under protection of a hedge, the actual grain being in the terminal warehouses in the central markets. During the shipping season primarily elevators usually are only partially filled, it being the practice to ship out as fast as possible in order to leave bin space for incoming grain during the rush season. The rise in grain prices and the prevailing shortage in cars have had a noticeable effect during the past two years in crowding the capacity of primary grain elevators.

The volume of business handled by farmers' elevators ranges from 50,000 to 400,000 bushels a year, depending upon the number of elevators in operation at the various stations where they are located and the local crop conditions in particular years.

There are about 3,000 cooperative creameries and cheese factories located chiefly in Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, and New York, the remainder being scattered over about 30 other States. Very little of either of these products is carried in stock for any length of time by the manufacturing plants, it being mostly shipped to dealers in large distributing centers. About one-half of the American cheese manufactured is produced in Wisconsin, the total amount produced being about 320,000,000 pounds per year. The chief distributors, and therefore the chief holders, of butter and cheese, are private buyers and packing companies, very little of either product being sold direct to the consumer by the factory.

For your further information I am attaching hereto a table showing the number of organizations of each of the various kinds, together with their annual volume of business and the number of farmers who hold memberships. These figures have been very carefully estimated from a survey conducted by the Office of Markets and Rural Organization, and we assume are fairly accurate. The figures cover the year 1915, except in a few cases, where the latest reports were those for 1914. The classes of firms included under "miscellaneous" are buying and selling organizations, honey associations, and miscellaneous societies who gave no name which would designate the class of business in which they were engaged.

Trusting that this information will be of service to you, I am,
Very truly, yours,

Mr. BATHRICK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I am right when I say again that the farmers of this country do not ask for this unjust discrimination in the hour of the country's great trial.

It is not their fault if some overzealous Member of Congress should make it appear by the introduction of this amendment that our great farm organizations seek special privileges in exemption from their fair share of the war burden. They will repudiate this effort to place them in a class with monopolists and food sharks. The whole tenor of this sort of legislation is to aid and encourage our farmers to produce food for the people at home and our brave soldiers at the front, but it is not intended to aid them to control the food supply. No farmer would withhold bread from his own sons or the sons of others, when these have gone on the firing line, ready to lay down their lives for the great principle of freedom and the defense of our flag.

This amendment is an offense to our best citizens. It is almost an insult to our farm organizations. I can not understand what motive prompted it or whose interest it was intended to serve. It surely was not born of a wise effort to serve well the people of this country in this crisis.

In the four and one-half years of my work in this body my sympathies and labors have been given to assist agriculture and aid the conservation of our food supply. I know much of the spirit and patriotism of our farmers; so much, in fact, that I will expect only a rebuff and indignation from them when they awaken to the false light cast upon them by this proposed exemption.

I have done my small share to encourage cooperation among the farmers. The Agricultural Department, supported by the money of all of the people, has done much to encourage it, and I do not believe that at this moment, when the poor of our cities are insufficiently fed because of abnormal high prices, that any farm organization desires privileges not granted under the law to others.

NIAGARA RIVER WATER POWER.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the measure under consideration is a temporary measure, extending the time for one year, and I understand the Secretary of War says it is necessary, so, of course, I have no objection to that being done, because I presume it is the wise thing to do under the circumstances.

What I want to say most is to call attention to the grave necessity for some intelligent action on the water-power situation. There are 35,000,000 potential horsepower of hydroelectric energy in the United States, and there are only 6,000,000 horsepower of that total amount in use. The water-power question is one of natural monopoly. The falling water that comes from the highlands to the lowlands and turns the turbine wheels and grinds out electrical energy in nothing more nor less than a natural monopoly; so it becomes to the very great interest of the owners of the 6,000,000 horsepower now in use to see to it that no water-power legislation is enacted for the utilization of the remaining 29,000,000 horsepower. On the other hand, there is a wide difference of opinion and a very regrettable difference between the House and the Senate. The chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee [Mr. FLOOD], the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee [Mr. ADAMSON], and the Public Lands Committee, of which I am a member, all have, I know, in good faith and to the very best of their ability, sought to have some solution of this problem. Times without number this body has passed, practically by unanimous vote, measures dealing with this subject. Members on the other side, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and the students of water power on both sides of the House, have supported these bills. But the bills have gone to another body, and there they have been loaded up with amendments which were more than the House would stand for, more than the students of water power in this country would stand for, more than the country would stand for, and as a result we are hung up in mid-air without any legislation whatever, and the falling water is running idly to the sea, doing no one any good.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman wish us to understand that the owners of the 6,000,000 horsepower have sufficient influence elsewhere to prevent legislation on this great question?

Mr. FERRIS. I did not state that, although many of these owners are against water-power legislation; and they are against it to this extent, that they have gone out in the West and bought up water-power sites, and got hold of it in different ways, and are holding it in cold storage to prevent development, so that they may go on with their monopoly. But I say it is almost a reflection, not on this House, because I feel that this House has done its duty, but it is almost a reflection on the Congress as a whole that some intelligent action is not perfected here.

I want to take a minute's time to say that we have been appropriating money here without stint. All that is necessary to get $100,000,000 out of this Congress is for somebody from somewhere to say that it is a war bill and needed and we grant it without a question; but when legislation is asked for to utilize some of the natural resources of the country that are our God-given right, when we are only asking an opportunity to develop it, there is a blockade on between the House and the Senate which results in no intelligent action being taken. I do not know what the solution of it will be, but it seems to me that those in authority, and it seems to me that individual Members of the House who have been students of the subject ought to do something somewhere to bring influence to bear, to get the press of the country to focus its attention on the obstructors who are holding back this legislation, and see if we can not get some results. Every resource is being drawn on to its full capacity, still one of the greatest and most useful of all natural resources is being neglected. I shall from time to time do what I can, but the subject is intricate and it needs combined help.

I am going to vote for this resolution to extend this time one year, because I think under the circumstances it is the intelligent thing to do. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the criticism made on the floor of the House against the Senate. I do not believe there is a blockade in that body on water-power legislation. I do not believe there is any foundation for the statement that the Niagara water-power companies are holding up this legislation in the Senate. The Members of the Senate have the same right to their opinions that we have to ours. They have fixed and honest convictions on water-power legislation, and I can not understand why a Member of this House should not be fair enough to concede to them the same right we claim for ourselves—the right to consider and investigate water-power questions without having their motives challenged and a statement made on the floor of this House that some improper outside influence is blockading or holding up such legislation.

Now, what are the real facts? There is a division of sentiment, a difference of opinion, on a great public question between these two bodies. The Senate of the United States maintains and has for years—since the very inception of this legislation—that the respective States of the Union own and should control the water power in the navigable rivers of the country, and that Congress, under the Constitution, has the right to control navigation alone as it affects navigable streams.

The Senate of the United States appointed a committee of five of its ablest lawyers. The chairman of that committee was Senator Nelson, of Minnesota, and the other members were Senator Root, of New York; Senator O'Gorman, of New York; Senator Chilton, of West Virginia; and Senator Culberson, of Texas, all able and distinguished lawyers. Who can question their motives? Who can truthfully say that they were improperly influenced by the water-power companies when they deliberately, carefully, and thoroughly investigated this subject from the very foundation of the Government down to the date of their report, and when they reached a unanimous opinion that the States own the water-power rights. How does it lie in the mouth of any Member of this House to say that their position or action was influenced by improper motives or outside interests?

This House is divided. There are Members who believe that the right to tax the users of water power is in the National Government. There are others, just as sincere and honest, who believe with the United States Senate that this right belongs to the respective States. Now, there is 600,000 horsepower within 75 miles of my city—Knoxville, Tenn. I believe the right to tax that water power belongs to the State of Tennessee, under the unbroken decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States from the foundation of this Government up to last December, when the latest opinion on the subject was rendered by that august tribunal. So I am going to stand here and fight for my State to have that taxing power, and I appeal to other Members of this House to study the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the opinion of the committee, composed of five of the ablest lawyers of the Senate, and to give those opinions careful and thorough consideration. If they do I believe the Members of this House will stand with the Senate when it comes to passing general legislation regulating water powers in the rivers of the respective States. While Members serve here as national lawmakers, they must not forget that they represent constituencies at home. The National Government is now afield to tax everything in sight, leaving practically nothing for the States to mainain their governments except personal and real-estate taxation.

So there is the division in this House and in the Senate, and the country will secure this important and needed general legislation on water power when the two Houses of Congress come together and settle their differences in line with the unbroken decisions of the highest court of this land, based upon the Constitution of the United States.

Now, as to the Niagara water-power companies. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] says that they are making money. What industrial plant and organization is making more money than the United States Steel Corporation, the greatest industry of the gentleman's home town of Birmingham? I am glad that company is making money, for it went to Birmingham and invested at least twenty or thirty million dollars. Take that plant, with its investment, business, and employees, out of Birmingham and it would be practically a dead town.

What did the Niagara power companies do? Twenty-odd years ago they erected the first electric plant of the kind in the United States in a village, with an expenditure up to date of over $60,000,000, according to the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and for years they operated without a dividend. Now they secured their original franchise from the State of New York. They enjoyed it without interruption and without challenge on the part of Congress or the National Government for over 10 years. They invested their millions in good faith. They have built up and developed a great industrial city. Their output is used throughout America and is absolutely essential to the welfare of the country, especially during our war with Germany. Why should we single out the Niagara power plants and let the one on Warrior River in the gentleman's [Mr. HUDDLESTON] State of Alabama escape? If we are going to legislate on this subject let us in all fairness make the legislation general and apply it to every water-power company in America which is using, without compensation, the water of our navigable rivers. There is one power company on the Mississippi River near Des Moines, one in my State below Chattanooga. They are practically in every State of the Union. They are located in Alabama, Tennessee, North Carolina, Georgia, Missouri, Illinois, New England, and throughout the West. Where is the justice or fairness in singling out only one river when there are hundreds involved?

Now, I know it is popular with some Members in this House to decry every successful industry in this country which is making money. That is the burden of their song.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not now. If it were not for the industries in Birmingham, the gentleman's [Mr. HUDDLESTON] own city, they would have an agricultural district there to-day instead of the greatest manufacturing district in the South. While he complains about the price of aluminum, that company—the Aluminum Co. of America—fixed the price of aluminum at 10 cents a pound to the Government below what it is receiving from private persons or corporations. Aluminum has advanced, and so has pig iron, which in Birmingham is quoted at $40 or $50 a ton, and I believe the hearings showed it could be made in Birmingham for $6 or $7 a ton.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; not now. Let the gentleman begin at home on pig iron and steel, and control the rates of the water-power company on the Warrior River almost in sight of Birmingham. Then we will give him full faith and credit for his crusade here against excessive rates on power and articles furnished during the war by industries located at Niagara Falls.

Something has been said about the president of the Aluminum Co. of America, Mr. Arthur V. Davis, serving on one of the committees of the Council of National Defense. I have known Mr. Davis for many years, and his company has large interests in the district I represent. A more honorable man does not live, and I venture to say that his conduct in the position named will be above criticism or reproach and his every action in the interest of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say in justice to our colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], who represents the Niagara district, that while he has been anxious and active about legislation of this kind, he has never attempted to block anything, but has always appealed for a permanent, just, and fair settlement of the issues involved. If the Niagara power companies are attempting to do what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has charged in reference to this matter, they are doing it without the knowledge, without the consent, and without the encouragement of the gentleman who represents the people of his district so well on the floor of this House. While the gentleman from Alabama is not pleased with the backbone of the Wilson administration, if he will be patient and endure the spineless administration a little while longer, we will give him a Republican administration with all the backbone he is looking for.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is going to make a great change, is it not?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not think it is well or becoming in a Democrat or a Republican at this time in our national crisis to do anything or say anything which reflects upon the courage, the honor, or the patriotism of Woodrow Wilson and his administration. [Applause.] If there are rumors, let us reserve our judgment and criticism until we know all of the facts.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Let us lay aside our criticism until we win this war, and then, after peace, settle any of the abuses or mistakes of the administration in handling the war before the American people, and not show any division in Congress or out of Congress at this time in the conduct of the war. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARNER). The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to get an extension of my time. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended. A number of gentlemen have asked for time on this resolution. Among them is the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and I made the suggestion to him, and I make it now to others who are not going to speak directly on the resolution. This resolution has to go to the Senate and we will have to remain in session until it is brought back, and during that time gentlemen who are not going to speak upon the resolution could occupy that time. I made the suggestion to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he take his time during the time we are waiting for the resolution to be returned from the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BATHRICK). What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. FLOOD. I ask unanimous consent that during the time the resolution is between the House and the Senate, if it is agreeable, that the gentlemen whose names I mention may take time—the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. EMERSON; the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. SHACKLEFORD; and the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. LENROOT.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent to control the time after the resolution passes the House and while we are waiting for it to be returned from the Senate.

Mr. FLOOD. I will make that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that he shall control the time during the interim that the bill is in the Senate until it is returned to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. But who knows when it will come back from the Senate? That might be an order that we would have to vacate.

Mr. FLOOD. My information is that it will take but a very short time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, we want to be assured that when it does come back it will be taken up immediately.

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, of course. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken on the resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time has expired, and the question is on the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I listened with much interest, and I say this meaning exactly what I do say, to what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] had to say. His contention, as I take it, is that there should be permanent legislation, and that is his sole contention; and I appeal from his plea here, as an advocate upon the floor, to his calm utterances when he was not under the stress of advocacy before the committee, when he plainly indicated and showed that permanent legislation was not possible at the present time; that it must of necessity wait a full investigation; and that the reason that we have not had legislation in the past was that there had not been the investigation which was necessary. Speaking before the committee about permanent legislation, the gentleman said:

> The reason why the Senate did not take it up for passage—
> The permanent bill—
> was that they they were convinced that sufficient information was not before Congress to enable it to act intelligently on the subject, and they thought that it ought not to be taken up by a system of piecemeal legislation, but that the whole problem should be handled at one time after a thorough investigation.

The Secretary of War came before the committee and Gen. Black came before the committee, and that was exactly what the gentleman from Alabama said, that we must have an investigation, which will take a considerable period of time; we must have an appropriation to enable us to make that investigation; and that we can not legislate with intelligence, much less with justice, until that investigation is had.

Therefore, so far as the argument is concerned that through granting this temporary permit we are deferring permanent legislation, it disappears, and it disappears upon the calm statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] before the committee.

Le us take up another piece of advocacy on the part of the gentleman, and I am sure that he lacks information; and I am sure that he will be glad to have me give it to him, because he does not want to be unjust. He spoke of this grinding monopoly, as he called it, the Aluminum Co. of America, and said that it had charged this Government an excessive price, 63 cents a pound, for aluminum. That is just the way that injustices are done—by the telling of half truths. What was the full truth? The full truth was this, and if the gentleman had pursued his investigation to its legitimate conclusion he would have found that in an emergency the Government needed some aluminum and it went to the Aluminum Co. of America.

That company said, "We have not got it, but if you need it, and if it is absolutely necessary, we will do this for you: We will go out into the open market, we will send every agent we have and buy up the scrap alluminum in the country, and we will melt it and give it to you at cost." They went through the United States raking and scraping here and there, and they piled up some scrap aluminum, and it cost them 56 and 57 cents a pound, and they turned it over, charging the Government for their expense in collecting, resmelting, and rerolling it and turning it over the enormous sum of 7 cents a pound—the actual and bare cost. That is what there is to this charge of 63 cents a pound, and all there is to it.

Let us take up another charge of the gentleman. He criticized the president of the Aluminum Co. of America because he is in the Council of National Defense, acting without pay in the emergency of the Government at the present time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Virginia to grant me four minutes more.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield four minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, we find that the Aluminum Co. of America is actually charging the Government 10 cents a pound less than the market rates. The market rate is 37 cents, and the company charges the Government 27 cents. I hold no brief for the Aluminum Co. of America. I never have done any business for them. I do not own a dollar of their stock. I never have seen Mr. Davis but on one occasion. I have never had any correspondence with him and know nothing of him, but I do believe that this House should not absorb information which is unjust to any man, and particularly I believe that it should not be unjust to those who constitute the Council of National Defense. I am not a Democrat, but I do recognize that, although this administration is Democratic, Republicans have a great duty upon them in this emergency, and I am not prepared to criticize the Council of National Defense or any member of it without the best of evidence that the charge is well founded and should be made.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I direct the attention of the gentleman to the fact that all of the criticism of these volunteers who have acted as an advisory council has come from the Republican side.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Not at all. I am answering the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], and if my able friend, whom I like and admire, had been present, he would realize that I am answering the charge of the gentleman from Alabama made on the floor this morning. I am saying that in this time of stress we need enthusiasm, we need the loyalty, we need the devotion of this great people, and we should not sow the seed of discord in prosecuting this war by saying, without knowing it, that there are at the head of affairs men who are dishonest while pretending to give their great ability and services to this Nation.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I believe, and will continue to believe until evidence of the most conclusive kind to the contrary is brought to my attention, that these men are serving, just as ostensibly as they are serving, as patriots, as loyal, public-spirited men, giving their time and devoting their services without compensation, simply and solely because they are patriots.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman know that practically all of these captains of industry who are on the advisory committees are Republicans? Is that the basis of his concern?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not believe it is so. The gentleman referred to one man by name——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Davis, Mr. Clark, Mr. Peabody.

Mr. DEMPSEY (continuing). And it is my understanding he has always been a Democrat and voted for Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman is it not a fact that when the Government and the President wants to get a man of brains to do something he is compelled to go to the Republican Party?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think so.

Mr. DYER. And when he wants to get a man to work for pay he always hires a Democrat?

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is entirely possible.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The President has not yet conscripted the gentleman from Missouri, has he?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; but——

Mr. DYER. I wish to say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that I am one of those who are trying to help the administration, and not like the gentleman from Oklahoma and some others who are trying to disorganize same and make this war a failure by such drastic measures as this prohibition proposition which you are trying to embody in the food bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DEMPSEY. If I can get one or two minutes more.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Anybody can make accusations.

Mr. DYER. I did not make any accusations against the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman said I attempted to disorganize the forces of this administration——

Mr. DYER. By voting for prohibition.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I am willing for my record to stand beside the record of the gentleman from Missouri any time and let the country say which one has stood most loyally by the administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word or two in defense of the action of the conferees on the part of the House from the inferential criticisms made of them by some who have spoken for the report they made on Senate joint resolution 13. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the power companies at Niagara Falls are charging an unjustifiable price for the power they generate from the water that is given them by the Federal Government, and I have not the slightest doubt that the companies that get that power charge an almost criminal price for the products they make from the use of this power, and I am one of those who would be glad to see some just and fair regulation of the power situation there. I know the resolution we have just agreed to is very favorable to the companies using this water, and while that does not make me very enthusiastic for the resolution, it does not induce me to oppose it, because I know it is necessary in the public interest. I introduced the resolution which the House passed yesterday, and which these gentlemen say is a so much better resolution than the Senate resolution. I think it is a better resolution, but it does no more to protect the Government or the people of this country from these extortions than the resolution we have just agreed to in the conference report. The House resolution embodied the suggestion made by the Secretary of War, which was that he should grant permits for the use of this water upon such conditions "as he might deem necessary to impose in the public interest." It also provided that permits should be obtained for the 20,000 cubic feet of water per second that the United States Government is authorized the issue of permits for from the Niagara River, and provided severe penalties for any individual, corporation, or company which used this water without a permit or used it after the permit expired. The Senate resolution simply extends existing law for 12 months.

When we took up last February the question of a permanent and comprehensive law for the regulation and use of this water the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], one of the strongest opponents of the Niagara power companies, opposed that bill and proposed that we do at that time just what we have done to-day; that is, that we extend the temporary resolution now in existence for one year and that we authorize the Secretary of War to make an investigation as to the use of the water at Niagara Falls and the power thereof and make an appropriation for that purpose. That is what the conferees on the part of the House have done in this conference with the Senate committee. The difference in the Senate resolution and the House resolution was that the Senate resolution simply extended the existing law for one year, which law only applies to the 4,400 cubic feet, and the House resolution proposed to require permits for the whole 20,000 cubic feet and applied penalties for the use of it. Those were the differences. Both resolutions proposed to extend the rights of these existing companies to use this water for 12 months. Neither resolution embodied any protection for the Government or the water except this provision suggested by the Secretary of War that he might impose conditions. So both resolutions extended the right of these people to go ahead and use this water. Our resolution was wiser and better, because it provided penalties for the whole diversion, but we were confronted with the condition that we were compelled to yield to the Senate or to stop the use of a good part of this water that is being used there now and is being used to generate power to make materials, every one of which, the Secretary of War tells us, are necessary for the use of the Army and Navy, for the use of the soldiers and men on our battleships, and the general prosperity of the country. The Secretary of War made this statement in reference to it:

> I have a feeling that practically everything made by the use of this power at Niagara Falls is war material. All of the abrasive material, chlorides, and the various alloys, all of them are war material.

He wrote me a letter and requested that the Committee on Foreign Affairs report the resolution as an emergency war resolution, and he called me up over the telephone yesterday and asked me to endeavor to get this resolution through, and, if necessary, to recede from the amendment which he had proposed to the present law, and which amendment I have just read; and, in view of those facts, I saw nothing for us to do, as the conferees on the part of the House, representing the will of the House, as I believe it was, that this resolution should pass and this water should be permitted to be used, and these manufacturers be permitted to go on, but to recede from two of the propositions about which the House and the Senate disagreed.

As to the third, the proposition about ordering an investigation of the general power conditions at Niagara Falls, the Senate receded.

I thought, Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements that have been made here about all the teeth being taken out of this resolution, that in justice to the conferees on the part of the House I should make this statement, showing the exact difference between the House resolution and the Senate resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

PROHIBITION AND THE FOOD BILL.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the food resolution and for the prohibition bill embodied in it. I understand that certain action is now contemplated which eliminates from the provisions of this bill the wine and beer provisions.

I have just received the following telegram from my district:

HARTSVILLE, S. C., June 29, 1917.

Hon. WILLARD RAGSDALE,
Washington, D. C.:

The Florence district conference, representing 10,000 Methodists, in session to-day passed unanimous resolution commending you for your support of the food bill as passed last Saturday with its prohibition provision and respectfully urge that you accept no amendment exempting wine and beer.

J. T. FOWLER,
Chairman Committee on Temperance.

I wish to incorporate this in the RECORD in order that it may be shown that the people of my district, as far as I have been able to learn, are practically unanimous in favor of my action. I have not received a communication of any kind from anybody in my district asking me to make this exception to the food bill. I shall therefore vote to sustain the position of the House as to prohibition at this time for the entire country on liquors, wines, and beer.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

ADDRESS BY WALTER WILLIAMS BEFORE THE EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, to the serious consideration of the heads of the executive departments of our Government, the journalists of the country, and the American people generally, I commend the address delivered to the late Editorial Association of Nebraska by Walter Williams, dean of the School of Journalism in the Missouri University. Dean Williams is a patriotic American and a thorough Democrat in the broad sense of that term. He is a journalist of great ability and has a keen sense of the responsibilities, privileges, and ethics of that exalted vocation. The address to which I refer is, as follows:

HOW PRESS CAN SERVE CAUSE OF DEMOCRACY—GIVE PEOPLE NEWS OF CONFLICT.

A great Nation girds on its armor. For what purpose and to what end? That the world may be made safe for democracy, that there may be just and lasting peace. Neither the armor nor the manner of its girding nor its use is in itself an end. We are not in this hideous war for war's sake. We are in it for the sake of peace—peace and democracy.

What is democracy? Just now many new definitions appear. Autocracy, becoming unpopular under its old name, seeks continuance by redefining democracy as the rule of the few, the tyranny ostensibly or really benevolent of groups of men to whom education or inheritance or position or the machinery of government gives accidental advantage. Indeed, the definitions of democracy are almost as numerous as those who profess to be Democrats and who do not follow their own profession.

Let me take for the purpose of this hour the best definition that I recall. It is that of Pasteur, the eminent French scientist, a tanner's son. "The true democracy," he said, "is that which permits each individual to put forth his maximum effort." To translate it yet further into the speech of the common folk, the true democracy secures to every man a chance to make the most of himself. It recognizes the equal moral worth of every man. To give practical effect to democracy thus defined governments are instituted among men not as ends in themselves but as means to an end—to insure to each man everywhere life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, the attainment of the fullest individual development in a social state.

But how may journalism in this present hour of opportunity serve the cause of true democracy?

GIVE PEOPLE NEWS.

First, by the service of information. Even in war time the public opinion of a democratic country is the only ultimate power. All else is delegated authority. The kind and character of this public opinion depends to a large degree upon the press, the moral efficacy of the general feeling and judgment which the newspapers do most to form. For the formation of public opinion information is needed. The newspaper, which, while not all of journalism affords its largest medium of expression, must continue to be a newspaper. This is not now the President's war nor the war of Congress. It is the people's war, or it ought not to be a war at all. To make it the people's war the people must know the news about the war. To make it a popular war the imagination must be stirred as it has not yet been stirred—stirred by the news of the ideas in combat by the news of the individuals in strife. To the intellectual assent which the American people have given there must be added the approval of the heart. The taxpayer will wish to know about the expenditure of his money. The mother will wish to know about her boy. Journalism may serve by merely recording things as they are. Accurate information must be given, of course. Confused and misleading impressions regarding facts must be avoided. Nothing that will give aid or comfort to the enemy should appear in print. The same fairness and accuracy of statement, the same freedom from prejudice and distortion should characterize publication of information in war time as in the days of peace. That it is more difficult does not make it any less necessary. But the news must appear. The uniformed men abroad fighting the battles of democracy should have the support of informed, not uninformed, men at home. Indeed, they can not be supported otherwise. This war is no game of blindman's buff. The first service of journalism in the present hour is the service unto all the people of information. Here unto democracy journalism is the first line of defense.

The second service of journalism in this grim hour is the service of exhortation. In an age on ages telling, at a time when the passions run high or depression comes, it is difficult to be calm and sane, to see things clear and to see them whole, to have courage and enthusiasm. Journalism has the opportunity of encouragement. It may by news presentation and editorial page promote calmness and courage. It may be a bulwark against hysteria. It may keep the wheels of business going round so that we shall have economic strength to bear the burdens that rest upon the shoulders of Uncle Sam. Speed up, we will say. This exhortation should be found upon reasoned facts. Adequate and accurate information must be the basis of effective exhortation. Journalism is a prophet as well as a recorder. The work of Hosea as well as that of Moses is typical of the service of the journalist in the present hour. Romance, the spirit of adventure, has died in the trenches, but we may keep it alive in the hearts of men. Are we not engaged in the search for democracy's Holy Grail?

The service of constructive criticism falls within the province of the press. Mistakes will be made in the conduct of the war—mistakes have been made in the conduct of the war. It is the duty of the press, freed from the meshes of partisanship and without thought of selfish advantage, to point out in the broadest way such mistakes and thereby to guard as far as may be possible against their recurrence. Individuals temporarily holding public office—clothed with a little brief authority or large—will wish to be free of publicity and of criticism. The press must not grant them this freedom. It will not grant it. Methods of taxation, of the delegation of power, of the raising of revenue, and of its disbursement, questions as to the aim and purpose of the war and of its continuance are of vital interest and importance to the American people.

PUBLICITY AID IN WAR TIME.

Here again the press has a plain duty to perform. Publicity will cure evils in war time no less than in the piping days of peace. A single example—in the enforcement of the selective-draft measure young men within the draft ages were asked to answer a question regarding exemption, a question unfortunately expressed and which at last it was sought to withdraw or explain away. When the question was honestly answered in accordance with the registration blanks, we were gravely told that reply thereto constituted cowardice on the part of those who replied. Again, statements sent out from Washington blundered into the bureaucratic error of announcing that registration totals should equal certain census figures. These figures, however, were estimates made on the census of 1910, pure guesswork as to the probable growth of States in population from 1910 to 1917, an estimate manifestly impossible to make with any degree of accuracy. On such Census Bureau estimates charges of slacker States and slacker communities were unwarrantedly made. It is in connection with such practices as these and matters of much larger consequence, involving property and life and liberty itself, that the press of the country must do the service of constructive criticism. Bureaucracy, as well as autocracy, is the enemy of democracy.

CONSTRUCTIVE CRITICISM.

Constructive criticism should be constructive—not destructive. The calling of names does not suffice. To refer to an individual as a pro-German because he differs from us may evidence the poverty of our vocabulary, but will not promote better political conditions. It does not make for national progress to denounce as traitors men who have other ideas of national safety or national honor than our own.

Constructive criticism will include interpretative information about the best in other peoples, not merely the worst. Lack of acquaintanceship between peoples promotes misunderstandings among nations. Undue boastfulness leads to strife. God is not an American. The flag above the church it not of itself an evidence of genuine patriotism, nor is the planting of potatoes or the purchasing of liberty bonds. Constructive criticism will point out the service that each man may render through self-sacrifice, which is frequently the antithesis of self-assertion. It will include humanity in its scope and not narrow itself by provincial denunciation. The dying words of Edith Cavell were:

Standing as I do in view of God and men, I realize that patriotism is not enough. I must have no hatred nor bitterness toward anyone.

For such criticism there must be freedom. The press, held to account by existing and proper laws for any libelous or treasonable utterance, must hold the very Government itself to strict accountability. Bad opinion may be published—but who shall say what is bad and what good opinion? Surely not the man or men regarding whom the opinion is expressed. Lèse majesté is a crime under an autocratic government, not in a democracy.

WOULD HAVE PREVENTED WAR.

If the press of Europe had been for a century free to print the news uncolored by Government influence, if it had been free to discuss in public the machinations of diplomacy, this hideous war would not have come. Certainly national antagonisms were increased and racial hatreds embittered by the international news served out by official or semiofficial sources, the Wolff Agency in Germany, Reuter's in England, the Havas in France, the Correspondenz Wilhelm in Austria, the Stefanie in Italy, the Ministry of Telegraph—frankly official—in Russia, and others in other lands. The news as thus circulated was seldom the actual truth—it was what the Governments wished the people of their own Nations and the Governments and people of other Nations to think was the truth. Let us permit no such frightful blunder to be made—even under the specious plea of military necessity—in this Republic. Many others than Bismarck manipulated the news. War took place in the open because—thanks to an enslaved and complacent press—the preparations therefor were carried on in secret. Censorship was an accessory before the colossal crime of war even if it was not a principal in bringing it about.

Close akin to the service of constructive criticism that the press may render, journalism may aid in the preservation and promotion of the ideals of democracy. What are the ideals of democracy? Whatever else we may include within our definition, certainly it will contain a declaration for freedom of speech spoken and written, for the recognition of the rights of minorities, for the freedom of the individual nation to work out its own destiny in its own way as a national unit in a world neighborhood, and for the freedom of the individual man while a social unit to work out his own destiny in his own way, for the recognition of the equal moral worth of every man.

PRESS FREEDOM MOST IMPORTANT.

With all these journalism is concerned. Unto the preservation and promotion of all it may lend aid invaluable. But with the first is its primary concern. Indeed, freedom of written and spoken speech enwraps them all. He whose mouth is stopped, around whose brain an iron band of autocratic rule is placed, may never rise to the full stature of democratic strength and opportunity. Freedom of speech is of interest not merely to the press. The press is but the outpost, which, if attacked and captured, permits the citadel of democracy—the soul of the Nation—to be taken. Journalism may help to win the war. It may help to win the war aright. But, more than that, it may help to make the war that is won aright a war worth winning. I make bold to say that unless the war preserves and promotes the ideals of democracy it will not be worth the winning. We can not all think alike. Unity of purpose does not necessarily mean uniformity of thought. The British Empire, held together by the cohesive power of a splendid imperial purpose, consists of a dominion here, a commonwealth there, and a principality yonder, under the headship of a ruler who is a king in one land and an emperor in another. The preservation of the ideals of democracy means the preservation of freedom of the press, of the right of criticism, of individual opinion, of deliberative consideration of public questions, of disagreement it may be with one's fellows as to the methods of conduct of the war and the terms of peace.

No more important battle in behalf of democracy has been waged in recent years than the struggle in Congress against the enactment of the censorship provision of the espionage bill. As members of the profession of journalism, charged with solemn responsibilities in this grave hour, we may not congratulate ourselves upon a complete and well-reasoned victory. Unfortunately the victory was not won upon the plain issue of the freedom of the press—fundamental to a democracy—but was in some measure the result of the desire of certain Members of Congress to oppose a bill presented by one of the agents of the people in office in Washington. Victory did not come upon the broad ground of the constitutional prerogative of the press, but to a degree upon clouded and partisan issues. Fortunately, however, we have a constitutional provision upon which the press may stand. Let me quote from an old document which is still the supreme law in the United States, made for times of war as for times of peace. "Congress shall have no power," says the Constitution of the United States, "to pass laws abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." The people of this Republic, it may be said in passing, declined to ratify the Constitution until this addition thereto was agreed upon.

SUPREME TASK OF PRESS.

Back even of the Constitution is the fundamental right and necessity of public opinion to express itself—without which there is no democracy. We come here to the ulterior power. The statement of its sovereignty needs no apology. Not only the honor and dignity but the very existence of a democratic state depend upon it. To preserve and promote them, by the creation of a sound and wholesome public opinion, is the supreme task to which the press must summon its every resource. Let no so-called necessity of war be permitted to be a cover for reactionary measures. It hath not yet been proved that a republic armed to the teeth and bent only upon material things shall endure. It is the spirit of nations, as of men, that keepeth alive.

Another and final service that journalism may render is the service of construction after the war. The United States has a future as well as a present. Many catchwords are used to describe the present world-shattering strife. Certainly this one is true. It is or should be a war to end wars. So the press, through news column and editorial comment and interpretation, may help—may largely help—to make impossible another war. This will be a different sort of a world when the war is ended—as the war must end. It will be a sadder but a more plastic world. The press may help to create public opinion that will dictate terms of peace that will bring peoples everywhere opportunities for social justice, for economic justice, for political justice—in short, for democracy. Jingoism should go, excessive armor should be cast into the scrap heap. A new era should come in which all the world will believe in and practice the belief that governments are not handled from above, that no individual group of individuals is chosen as beast of burden and none booted and spurred to ride them. The press will have taught the American people to be good sportsmen, to win the grim game of war fairly, and when it is won to shake hands with the vanquished with no rancor in the victor's heart. The talk about reconstruction after the war should begin now, not after the war is ended.

While a service of the press is the creation of such public opinion regarding terms of peace as will make peace terms certain that are democratic and right, the censorship rules given out by the committee on public information at Washington last month contain this most significant suggested prohibition:

Speculation about possible peace is another topic which may possess elements of danger, as peace reports may be of enemy origin, put out to weaken the combination against Germany.

That pronouncement is at variance with an earlier one: "Blessed are the peacemakers."

PEOPLE SHOULD HAVE VOICE.

Such a prohibition, if carried into effect, as of course it can not be yet—thank God—in this Republic, would mean, as another has said, that "the administration alone could conclude peace when it was ready and not before and on its own terms, and that both opinion as to the wisdom of its course and information regarding it would be withheld from the public."

With such secret diplomacy no real friend of democracy can agree. "People who pay for and fight the war have a right to know on what grounds it may be ended and when. They should have a voice in the restoration of peace and in the dictation of the terms upon which that peace may be rightfully won." We must prepare for the day—not far distant, let us hope—when—

The tumult and the shouting dies;
The captains and the kings depart.

The war may last for years. It may end, as it came, overnight. However this may be, now is the time for the press in every proper way to enlighten and educate a public opinion that will make this world safe for democracy and assure genuine democracy for the world when the war fortunately comes to a close.

I congratulate you as members of a profession having large responsibility at a crucial time in the world progress. I speak to men in whose hands is, to a large degree, the making of a world. We are building a world house anew. Blood-stained bricks enter into its construction. Let us see that the blood is not shed in vain. Let us see that the new house of humanity has in it ample room for all peoples, room to grow to the fullest stature of individual and national strength. Macaulay said with truth:

There are only two forms of government—government by public opinion and government by the sword.

Let us see to it that government by public opinion dominates, making unnecessary and impossible government by the sword. Holding in largest measure the sources of publicity under our control, the output of raw material out of which public opinion is manufactured, let us with courage and patriotism and love for all humanity do our "bit." Thus and thus alone may permanent government by the sword be averted and an enduring, righteous peace prevail.

ALL JOURNALISTS IN SAME BOAT.

What I have said of journalism as a weapon for democracy applies to small newspapers as well as to large newspapers, to the rural weekly as to the metropolitan daily, to the man in humblest position as to the man in the most conspicuous place—reported, editor, publisher—alike. We are all in the same boat. We can not leave the rowing of it to other hands. We are all members of the same noble profession. Responsibility for its dignity, its honor, and its high service rest upon us all. If there be those amongst us who, through indifference, cowardice, or unpatriotism, are recreant to their trust as journalists of America in such a fateful hour as this, let us seek to win them back to paths of patriotic courage and devotion by mild and gentle words or, failing, let us scourge them with whip of small cords from the temple of journalism they profane.

Ideas, not navies, still rule the seas. Ideas, not armies, yet dominate the land. It is increasingly and ever true—the whole quotation makes the meaning clear—that

Beneath the rule of men entirely great,
The pen is mightier than the sword.

The ship of state is upon a new and uncharted sea. Information as to the voyage, as to the officers and the crew, is needed. It is for us to supply this information. It is needed to steady and keep in heart those aboard so that the bunkers may be filled with coal and the pantries with food, and that each may carry on. Constructive criticism of the conduct of the voyage is needed to see that the helm is not shifted wrong nor the course changed under specious plea to an unknown port far from the desired haven of democracy. Enactment of right rules of travel, and obedience thereunto—nay, even the readjustment of the ship's accommodations—may be necessary in order that the ship of state, flying colors of freedom, may be habitable for all alike, not some perpetually condemned to the steerage and some permitted always cabin life. Unto such management, for such ends, those truly serve who only stand and write.

Thus the war itself, frightful as it is and more frightful, may serve the ideal of democracy which Pasteur dreamed—where each man has a chance to make the most and best of himself, and, as far as peace and law and honest wage and aggressive brotherhood can make it so, an equal chance. To aid unto this good end—to make the world safe for democracy and to keep democracy safe in our land—is the challenge unto you and me to-day.

Impossible, you say—nay, nothing is impossible so long as our hearts are young and our faith sure and there is before our eyes the vision high and splendid—nothing is impossible to men engaged upon and genuinely interested in the profession of journalism—journalism, the fascinating, great, unfinished new adventure.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

PERMISSION TO BRAND WHITLOCK TO ACCEPT DECORATION.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker and gentleman of the House, I desire to address the House for a few moments upon the report sent here by the President yesterday, in which he asks Congress to grant permission to Brand Whitlock, our minister to Belgium, to accept some decoration of the Grand Cordon of the Order of Leopold.

Now, this comes to us because the Constitution of the United States has provided that no one who is in the employ of the service of the United States shall accept any title, emolument, or decoration, or things of this character, without the consent of Congress. We have entered into this great war; we are sending soldiers to Europe; we are sending doctors to Europe; and we are sending sailors over there. The first thing we know we will have decorations and titles offered to the officers of our Army and Navy. What will we do? Now, this is the first application that has been made, and I think this Congress might as well now as at any other time protest against anything of that character, and let it generally be known that it will grant no permission for the acceptance of any such decorations or titles. [Applause.]

Now, this title business is a subject on which the rich daughters of America have a monopoly. The wealthy girls who have money and no brains, they buy these titles.

Mr. HARDY. Is there any title involved in this decoration?

Mr. EMERSON. I do not know that there is; but this decoration is only given to kings, princes, and high officials. It does not make any difference, I will say to the gentleman, whether it does or not, we might as well stop this policy of officers or other people in the employ of the United States accepting any decoration, any emolument, or any title; and if we stop this one we will have no trouble in the future; if we grant this one, maybe the next one that will come in will be an application to have some American general made a lord, or something of that kind. [Applause.]

Now, our forefathers foresaw this situation, and wrote it into the Constitution that Congress would grant no title, and no person in the service of the United States should accept such title without the consent of Congress. I do not know that Mr. Whitlock wants this——

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman draw a great distinction between accepting a title and a memento of gratitude?

Mr. EMERSON. But this is a decoration given only lords and high officials. I do not know that Mr. Whitlock wants it, but I do think we ought to discourage this policy now, especially as this is the first application, and the war has just begun.

Mr. HARDY. Just one moment. We ourselves awarded a medal for the courageous service rendered by some Germans in charge of a vessel who rescued some of our seamen.

Mr. EMERSON. A medal might be another thing, but this is some decoration given only to lords and high officials. Maybe it carries some title.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] think one of our citizens might accept as a memento the title of lord?

Mr. HARDY. Oh, no. I was trying to draw a distinction between conferring a title and giving a memento of gratitude.

Mr. EMERSON. I understand. But suppose you permit the acceptance of this decoration, not knowing what it is. The next one may be a title of lord or duke or marquis, or something of that kind.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Has the gentleman examined the precedents?

Mr. EMERSON. I can not find the record of anybody accepting it heretofore.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will examine the RECORD in the last Congress he will find that in an extension of my remarks I collected those precedents. I am in entire agreement with the gentleman in his position.

Mr. EMERSON. I think this policy of accepting titles or decorations or emoluments or anything from a foreign country by anybody in the employ of the United States in any capacity should be stopped here right now. [Applause.]

I say, I for one protest against the granting of this permission. I appreciate the very great service that Mr. Whitlock has rendered, but he has done no more than many of our ministers have done. He has not done as much as Ambassador Herrick did in France at the outbreak of this war, at least he has done no more. Now is the time to stop this business of decorating Americans. I do not so much oppose this individual decoration, but it will establish a precedent, and when this war is over we will have lords and dukes and princes and the Lord knows what.

Our fathers wisely provided for this situation and wrote into the Constitution of the United States this provision:

No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign State.

This was a very wise provision in our Constitution. I want it understood that I have no personal objection to Mr. Whitlock, but I do oppose the establishment of such a precedent. Congress might as well set its foot down upon this gift or title business now. We are sending soldiers, sailors, doctors, and others to the battle fields of Europe, and if we allow the granting of this decoration it will establish a precedent, and the first thing we will know we will have a collection of these lords and dukes and such things on our hands.

There have been enough of our girls who have purchased these lords and dukes and decorations. What Mr. Whitlock has done in Belgium he has done as the representative of this Nation, and the credit is due to all the people of this country and not to our representative. If any minister of ours were to receive a decoration or title, I would suggest that the great work done by our ambassador to France, Mr. Herrick, at the outbreak of this war, would entitle him to all the titles that could possibly be bestowed upon any person.

Let this Congress here and now set its foot down hard upon any such proceedings as the title-and-decoration privilege. We want no kings, czars, kaisers, lords, dukes, marquises, or decorations in this country. We are fighting to democratize the world.

I am surprised that as good an American as Brand Whitlock would want this decoration, and I am a little surprised that the President would ask that Congress permit the acceptance of these decorations, as he knows it may lead to some embarrassing situations during this war. I have stood with the President in all things he has asked of Congress during this war session, but I must oppose this request. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARNER). The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

NIAGARA RIVER WATER POWER.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I did not expect to say anything on this proposition, but I am heartily in favor of the adoption of this report. In fact, it was the proposition that I made in the committee, and therefore I urged that it should be agreed upon by the conferees.

The impression has been made here undoubtedly by some Members of the House that the Government is not in control of these large concerns. Why, the situation is that they can not get a drop of water of the 4,400 cubic feet unless the Secretary of War permits them.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. Not just at this moment. These permits he issues, and they are revocable at any moment, at any hour, on any day, in any week, in any month. The Secretary of War, if he desires to, can make conditions in the issuance of these permits which will prevent these companies from charging exorbitant prices for their products, and these companies are in the control of the United States Government.

The trouble with this whole business is that Congress has not done its duty. Why, for 50 years they have been using water out of the Niagara River. The Hydraulic Power Co. was first established away back in 1853, and they did not make any money for 50 years, and it has only been during the last decade or so, since Niagara has become the very seat and center of the electrochemical industry of the world, that these companies have been making any large amount of money. Congress has been at fault. We have not sought to control the diversion of the water in the Niagara River. The first time Congress laid its hand on the matter was in the Burton law in 1906, but that was a law passed for the purpose of preventing the destruction of the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls, and did not relate at all to the question of power or the compensation of power. It has been only in the last few years that the question of power and the compensation of power has come up and has agitated the popular mind, and it is up to the Congress of the United States to pass permanent legislation.

I am not aware, as a member of the committee or as a Member of this House, that any of these companies has been preventing Congress from passing permanent legislation. I know they would rather have a law upon the statute books, so that they will know next year and the year afterwards whether or not they can use this power generated by the diversion of these waters, than to come here year after year asking Congress to extend these temporary permits. They did not initiate this legislation. It was initiated by the War Department, by Gen. Crozier. Why? Because these things which are produced in the city of Niagara all go into the manufacture of war materials and war necessities, and therefore the Army and the Navy are interested in this proposition. They have not been here begging Congress to pass this law. It has been the War Department that has been asking for this legislation.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Has any effort been made to secure necessary information with a view to enacting permanent legislation?

Mr. FOSS. Yes. We have secured information through the hearings of the committee, but there has not been any thorough investigation or report upon the whole subject of diversion of water. That has been recommended by the Secretary of War and by Gen. Black, the Chief of Engineers, and we have incorporated that provision in this report, so that at the next session of Congress I hope we shall have an exhaustive report upon the subject, and that will pave the way and be the necessary step toward permanent legislation.

While I say Congress has been to blame because it has not taken up this matter, I want to say that the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, under the able chairmanship of my friend from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has done its part. We passed a law through this House at the last session of Congress, but it was held up in the Senate. But I am not here criticizing the other branch. Far be it from me. But I say when this report comes in, exhaustive and full as it will be, it will then be the duty of Congress to pass permanent legislation, and there is no body of people anywhere in the world, in my judgment, who want it more than the people of Niagara, the men who work in those factories and in those great establishments, because they want this whole question settled. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 10 minutes.

SUPPORT OF THE ADMINISTRATION BY MR. FINLY H. GREY.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] incorporated in the RECORD, with an accompanying statement, a letter from the President of the United States directed to Mr. Bent Wilson, at Cambridge City, Ind. Along with his statement he recounted the votes of my former colleague, Hon. Finly H. Gray, upon the naval program, from the time Mr. Gray became a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs until he went out of Congress.

I would not say anything on this occasion—and I am glad the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has come upon the floor—if it were not for the fact that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] attempted to prove one of two things: Either that the President of the United States was stronger in the State of Indiana than either party, or that the President had premeditatedly and deliberately attempted to deceive the voters of the State of Indiana.

It was my pleasure to serve for six years in the House with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Gray, during two years of which I was intimately associated with him on the Committee on Labor. I do not believe a more conscientious, painstaking, or honorable legislator ever occupied a seat on this floor.

Mr. Gray was opposed to a large navy. He was conscientious about it. A great many of us differed with the naval policy of this country in 1911 and 1912, because every one of our naval experts attempted to prove that the superdreadnaught type of construction was wiser than the building of auxiliary cruisers, torpedo-boat destroyers, and submarines that we need so much in this day to make our Navy balanced.

Mr. Wilson, of Indiana, seemingly addressed a letter to the President of the United States, in which he asked the question as to whether Mr. Gray had supported the administration.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. On the preparedness plan.

Mr. HOWARD. On preparedness and other things. Mr. Gray voted for every single solitary piece of legislation that the Democratic administration stood for in the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses, with the sole exception of his opposition to the very large naval program in which the country was launching and clamoring for, but he did support the normal program of the preceding years without reluctance.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] winds up his speech by saying—

> I am content that the people shall determine the causes that brought about the result of the election in the sixth Indiana district. My only purpose in enumerating the facts herein is that the public may judge whether the President had any warrant under the facts for writing the letter that he did in support of the candidacy of Finly H. Gray.

As a matter of fact, every vote that was cast in this House by Mr. Gray from the time he entered it until the time he went out of it was in consistent support of the Democratic administration and the Democratic policies as enunciated by the President of the United States, and the President stated the facts as to Mr. Gray's support of his administration.

Now I know what is the matter with my good friend from Indiana [Mr WOOD]. He means well, but here is his process of mental operation: If I were to take him up to a beautiful mansion, with rare statuary on the lawn and a great stretch of smooth, green grass beneath gigantic oaks, and I should ask him to admire the beautiful scene, he would not do that. He would look through the keyhole of the front door and find a skull cap on the hatrack. [Laughter.] Now he has found a great bugaboo. He is trying to make the people of the State of Indiana believe that the President of the United States deliberately wrote a letter to deceive the voters in the campaign in the State of Indiana, for the purpose of bringing about the election of a Democrat in that particular district. What I am now saying I say in defense of a colleague for whom I had a most affectionate regard when he was a Member of this House, and as I said in the outset, whatever he did in opposition to any measure or in espousing any measure, he did it conscientiously, with all the light he had before him, and I repeat that the only time any opposition was ever interposed by Mr. Gray to any part of the Democratic program in the six years he was on this floor was purely and simply to what he believed to be an extravagant naval program. Now, the truth of the business is, Mr. Gray at heart was a pacifist; and I do not want you gentlemen to lose sight of the fact that up until after the declaration of war in Europe the President himself was not so strong for the very large naval and military program; but he had farsightedness enough to see what was coming, that it was a practical impossibility for us to keep from becoming involved with the war-crazed Kaiser, and my friend Gray believed that we were safe because Germany was involved in war.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. FOSS. Is it not also a fact that the Democratic Party has never been for a strong navy or a strong army at any time during the last dozen or fifteen years?

Mr. HOWARD. I will say this to the gentleman from Illinois, that there would not be any Navy in this country to-day if it had been left to the Republican Party. [Laughter.] They gave us a lot of old flat-bottomed, inefficient tubs. They spent more money per capita on the ships of the Navy than any other party on earth would have spent, and gave us ammunition to shoot out of the guns on those ships that would not penetrate a cowhide at 2,000 yards, much less armor plate. They handed us a lemon that was rotten at both ends when they turned the Navy over to the Democratic administration in 1913. That is what you did. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Is it not a fact that William C. Whitney is known in history as the father of the American Navy?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, sure; that is ancient history. He was the daddy of the American Navy. If the gentleman will permit me, the truth of the business is that the Republicans never took the initiative in anything but going to sleep on the job, so far as this Government was concerned. All of the dynamic forces that have been put behind this Government since its foundation have been put into it by the Democrats of this country. The Republicans never did anything but drink the swill that was in the trough that was left over from Democratic administrations. [Laughter.] The gentleman says that the Democrats never did anything for the Government. Why this man that you Republicans have been so quick to ridicule, the present Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels, has done more for the American Navy in the four years of his term than you did in 20 years. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. FLOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent that after the disposition of the routine business on next Tuesday I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that after the disposition of the routine business on Tuesday next he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes. Of course, if there are any conference reports, revenue bills, or appropriation bills the request does not go. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION IN CONGRESS.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the adoption of the conference report the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] made some very broad and sweeping statements concerning the situation of the water-power legislation in Congress, and I want to take occasion to correct—if I may use that term—one or two statements he made. It is important because there are many new Members who are not familiar with the contest that we have had in the past over this very important question.

The gentleman states that there are honest differences of opinion between the Senate and the House, and that there are honest differences of opinion in the House among different Members on this question. That is undoubtedly correct. But nevertheless the facts do stare us in the face that, although there be honest differences of opinion, there is one group of Members upon both sides of this Capitol who seem to be willing to forget their honest differences of opinion provided we give perpetual franchises to these great water-power interests and let them have all there is in the United States for all time to come. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Tennessee says that he will resist to the utmost any effort to deprive his State of Tennessee of the right to tax these water-power interests. So far as I know there never has been one word uttered on this floor in any of these contests seeking to deprive the State of Tennessee from any right of taxation that it has over these questions. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. LENROOT. Not an interruption, but I will yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Are there not two factions, one contending that the Government shall have this revenue and the other——

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all, I know what the gentleman wishes to ask. The State of Tennessee has and always will have the fullest right of taxation. What the gentleman wants is that the State of Tennessee shall have in addition the right to secure revenue for the privilege granted, not by the State of Tennessee but by the United States Government. [Applause.] The gentleman might just as well say that if he owns a building in his home town that it is taxation when he gets rent for that building and that the State of Tennessee ought to have the right to appropriate the rent from this property.

Mr. AUSTIN. I take that position because the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that this right belongs to the State and not to the Nation.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Supreme Court has decided that way, why do you come to Congress for any franchise or legislation; if they have the right, why come to Congress at all? But when you do come to Congress and ask for a privilege, no court in the land has said that Congress has not the right to attach as a condition to that privilege remuneration for the privilege granted.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Not now.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman asked me why we came to Congress, and I think I am entitled to state why we come.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Very briefly.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the real controversy between those who believe that the property rights in the water power belong to the State and those who believe that the property rights belong to the Nation? Is not that the difference?

Mr. LENROOT. Hardly that, I would say. I do not know of anyone in the Western States, where the doctrine of appropriation prevails, who says that Congress has in the least degree—certainly we have not in any bill that we have passed—interfered with any right that a State has in the water. No one has ever made that contention. But we have jurisdiction over the navigable streams——

Mr. HARDY. For the purposes of navigation, and that is the contention of the State rights advocates, that they have the right to rent out the water power.

Mr. LENROOT. We are not renting out the water power. I wish the gentleman could understand the difference between renting water power and adopting a condition to the privilege that we grant. If the State owns the water power, they may attach such conditions as they see fit, but it has nothing to do with the right of the Government to say we will permit you to obstruct a navigable stream upon such conditions as we lay down.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman was very particular to designate the State's right and power to tax the property. There is property in the water power itself, and who owns that?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I should be delighted to yield further to the gentleman, but I have promised to yield to two others.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not ask for any further time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. The conference report on the Niagara water-power bill having been received, the control of time by the gentleman from Virginia is exhausted. It is now a matter of unanimous consent.

Mr. FLOOD. I promised to yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] five minutes and to the gentleman from Alabama five minutes.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman get control of the time?

Mr. FLOOD. By the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL].

EXEMPTION OF WINE FROM PROHIBITION MEASURE.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, several Members of the House have during the last few days alluded to the wine interests of California and the supposed desire of that State that wine shall be favored by being excepted from the provisions of the proposed prohibition measure. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], while shedding a few crocodile tears over prohibition the other day, referred to me as an "eminent strategist," intimating, I presume, that I desire that California wine should be a victor in the present contest.

Mr. Speaker, the State of California has itself condemned its own wine industry by the ballot of the people. In November of last year a stringent State-wide prohibition amendment of the constitution was submitted to the people. The provisions of that amendment made wine an outlaw in exactly the same degree that it outlawed whisky and beer.

Including the entire State vote as cast on this amendment, excluding only the vote of the three largest cities, this amendment was adopted by a substantial majority.

Furthermore, Fresno County, which produces more grapes than any other county in the world, gave a majority of 2,500 for this amendment, destroying its own wine-grape industry.

Likewise, the county of San Bernardino, which contains the largest wine-grape vineyards in the world, exceeding 4,000 acres in some cases, gave a majority of 5,000 for this bone-dry amendment.

Both of these counties are under their own local vote entirely dry, except in the case of one oil-mining town in Fresno County and the city of Fresno.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

PRICE OF ALUMINUM TO THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, apologists for monopolists are funny fellows. It is wonderful how incredulous they are when something against a monopolist is said, and how childlike and extremely credulous they are when something in defense of the monopolist is brought forward.

We had Mr. Davis before our committee, and it was suggested to him that it had been said that his company, the Aluminum Co. of America, had been selling its product for as high as 60 cents a pound. He repudiated that charge with indignation and asserted that it was not a fact. He then proceeded to tell what his company had charged, and with much circumlocution, aptly fitted, though of course not designed, to conceal rather than to disclose, showed that his concern during the last two years had charged from 27 cents to 35 cents a pound, and then he said in conclusion:

You will see, therefore, that the statement or impression that we are selling our product to the United States consumers at 60 cents a pound is as erroneous as such a statement could possibly be.

That was his positive statement. The examination proceeded, and after a considerable time Mr. Davis was about to be excused, when he said:

Can I say one word more? I just want to state in closing that entirely regardless of any other impression that I may have made upon the committee, I do hope that I have succeeded in convincing the committee that this alleged price of 60 cents per pound and this cost price of 7 cents per pound are so far out of the way from the truth that it ought not to be given any further consideration by the committee.

Then I asked Mr. Davis:

What is the highest price you have ever charged?

Mr. Davis replied:

Do you mean the highest price we have ever charged under this system?

And then he went back to circumlocution, but I interruped and asked:

Under any system?

He answered:

We have charged as high as 60 cents per pound, but in making those prices we have made them after we have sold our product out, and when we were obtaining a large supply in the open market from scrap.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] seems to be under the impression that Mr. Davis went with a basket on his arm around over the country picking up broken spoons and old plates and one thing and another, trying to get the Government a little aluminum that it needed. But, Mr. Speaker, you will note that Mr. Davis testified that his company had large quantities of scrap. Now, I ask this question of Members of the House as reasonable men: Is it possible that scrap aluminum sells for more in the market, five times as much as it costs to produce the original ingots? We all know that it does not under ordinary circumstances. There may have been something about this transaction that I do not understand that brought the price up to 56 cents. I am amazed at the credulity of the gentleman, unless he has more facts before him than our committee had, that he should reach any such conclusion.

Mr. Davis was not candid with the committee when he made that statement. Col. Kellar, from the Chief of Engineers' office, a few days ago, left with our chairman contracts which had been made with our Government during the last year, by which this monopolist exacted 63 cents per pound for his product.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who made the contract with the Government?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not know.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What position upon this commission does Mr. Davis occupy?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He is the chairman of the subcommittee on aluminum of the advisory commission.

There is one other thing that I desire to refer to. This company has a contract to make 1,000,000 canteens for the Government at 91 cents each. Each of these canteens contains not over half a pound of aluminum.

Mr. FLOOD. Seventy-four cents.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Davis himself said 74 cents, but an official of his company who was present corrected him and said 91 cents. Of course, the cost of fabrication is something. You have to send the metal through rollers and stamp it out and weld the edges together. I have carried a canteen, and I know that it does not take very much labor to make one. They are not ornamental; they are useful. The Government is paying 91 cents each for a million canteens, and the metal in them does not cost over 5 or 6 cents each.

I know the spirit; I have been shocked to meet with it here in the House. It seems to be assumed that we are in duty bound to apologize for anything wrong that any of our constituents may be doing—if any of our own constituents are exploiting the people, if they are sweating the public, our mouths must be closed and we must not say a word against anyone else who is guilty of similar rascality; we have got to defend that. That is the idea put forward by certain gentlemen here very frequently. Last Congress when in the public interest I took up the matter of opposing a grant of Niagara, of voting away Niagara to monopolies I was verbally castigated upon the floor of the House by a gentleman who was not on the committee having charge of the matter and did not live anywhere in that part of the country and supposedly had no particular interest in it. He called my attention to the fact that I had in my own State the Alabama Power Co., and that since they had received grants of water power, valuable grants, without any compensation whatever to the Government, and they were engaged in oppressing the people, that therefore I must close my mouth to any such wrong committed in another part of the country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this Niagara resolution has not passed the House?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. What is the gentleman's idea in talking about it?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I explain to the gentleman from Massachusetts that we have important legislation pending before our committee. The resolution that has been passed is merely a temporary resolution. Permanent legislation must be enacted in the future, and the House now ought to know, and the country ought to know, the facts in regard to this matter.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman desire a quorum here that he may proceed?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; I do not——

Mr. WALSH. I will not object.

Mr. HUDDLESTON (continuing). The gentleman from Massachusetts and other gentlemen present are entirely sufficient for an audience, and I may communicate to the country through them. May I have two minutes additional?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman can proceed for two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Now, to-day when I again call attention to the abuses and exploitation being perpetrated on the Government by a monopoly, the same gentleman gets up and again castigates me with words and calls attention to the fact that a great corporation—the United States Steel Corporation—has a branch down in my district, and argues that therefore I should be silent as to other oppressive monopolies; that I ought to break up the United States Steel Corporation before I take up anybody else. Now, I want to say to the gentleman I am not an apologist for the United States Steel Corporation. When I noticed the other day that the splendid head of the Shipping Board had declined to allow the steel interests of this country to hold up the Shipping Board for steel at $96 a ton, when the Navy was getting it at $56 a ton, when I know enough about the business to know it does not cost to produce over from $20 to $30 a ton, I applauded him and rejoiced that we had an honest official. [Applause.] I am not willing to defend any such wrongs, and the gentleman must not expect me to have my mouth stopped by any such facts. [Applause.] I would like to say further to the gentleman that his estimate of me is much too low, and that he entirely misunderstands my spirit and my purpose here if he expects me to defend monopoly and oppression merely because there are monopolists and oppressors in my own State. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the resolution (S. J. Res. 13) extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River," shall remain in effect.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 67. Joint resolution to fix the status and rights of officers of the Public Health Service when serving with the Coast Guard, the Army, or the Navy; and

S. J. Res. 13. Joint resolution extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River" shall remain in effect.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Tuesday, July 3, 1917.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Also, petition of citizens of Morristown, N. Y., for full national prohibition of the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating beverages for the period of the war, in conservation of the man power, military, and industrial efficiency, and the food supply of the Nation, and urging that all liquors now in bonded warehouses and elsewhere shall be commandeered by the Government and redistilled for undrinkable alcohol, to be purchased by the Government for war purposes, and opposing an increase in the tax on intoxicating liquors as a means of raising a revenue to prosecute the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SNYDER: Petition of sundry residents of the thirty-third district of New York for national prohibition during the period of the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi: Petition of Woman's Missionary Society of the State of Mississippi, favoring prohibition of the liquor business as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: Petition of the Kinnikinnic Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, of Colorado Springs, favoring the creation of effective zones around all military camps; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of the tenth district, Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Colorado, urging prohibition as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of the Longmont Local, No. 170, of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of Colorado, urging that all men trained and actively employed in the actual production of live stock and other food products be left on the farms and ranches and be given like honors with those called to the Army and Navy, at least until they are actually required for military duty; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 2, 1917.

(Legislative day of Thursday, June 28, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

WOMAN-SUFFRAGE PROPAGANDA.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the National American Woman Suffrage Association, organized a great many years ago, is authorized to speak officially for the woman suffragists of the United States. That organization publishes a paper known as the Woman Citizen, and in its issue of the 30th of June appears an article entitled "The picket and the public." It refers to some recent events which have transpired in the city of Washington through the activities of a small organization calling themselves the Woman's Party and evidently much more anxious for notoriety than it is for the cause of woman suffrage. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial, which is short, be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PICKET AND THE PUBLIC.

The National American Woman Suffrage Association, comprising the great body of organized suffragists the country over, deplores as absurd, ill-timed, and susceptible of grave and demoralizing suspicion, the tactics of the isolated handful of suffragists at the National Capital who think to advance the cause of suffrage by demonstrations like the recent banner episodes at the White House.

Is that plain?

The National American Woman Suffrage Association likewise deplores as unfair and wasteful the reiterated demands upon it from friend and foe of suffrage alike to "repudiate," "denounce," "state its position on the subject." It can, apparently, repudiate and denounce and state its position till the crack of doom and still be left at the mercy of clamorers for more denunciations and more repudiations. These clamorers, particularly those who are suffragists, could be about a bigger business than such footless insistence. Concerned as it is with a great constructive, forward-looking, forward-leaping program for furthering the suffrage cause, the National American Woman Suffrage Association deplores having its time, energies, and attention constantly deflected to offset the effects of publicity tactics with which it is not, and never has been, in sympathy and which it has emphatically condemned and never condoned.

Is that plain?

And now—

The National American Woman Suffrage Association wants to point out that it is not blind, if the clamorers are, to the fact that every time it concedes to the clamor it is but playing the publicity game into the hands of the small group of suffragists to whose campaign publicity is fundamental.

For where agitation is the watchword publicity is the achievement.

Can it not be understood once and for all, by suffragists, by press, and by general public, that the White House tactics of the picketers are but a detail of a publicity campaign which suffragists and press and general public immeasurably further by the attention which they center upon it? (The lady from Missouri who tore down the pickets' banner built up the pickets' publicity as no picket and no banner could have done.)

Not all such publicity aids are hostile in their animus. There is no question that men are encouraging the small group that is committed to picket tactics. As grown-ups encourage a forward child whose antics are plaguing other grown-ups so do men of otherwise discriminative intelligence encourage the banner bearers.

And despite an increasingly fine balance of judgment on the part of editors and reporters, there is no question that the attitude of a part of the press is an encouragement. From the viewpoint of news a defy to the President of the United States, even flaunted on a pretty little purple and gold banner, is highly available "front-page stuff," and there is the gayest and friendliest of understandings between many newsmen and the banner bearers.

While we are placing the blame, therefore, let us divide it fairly and squarely—none at all to the suffrage cause, none to the organized suffragists who resent having that cause drawn into such fracases—and one part to the pickets who incite these ructions, one part to the press that spreads the story in the way most calculated to make a prolonged sensation of it, and one part to the public that thrills humanly over its own shocks.

It is a fact that there remains in America one man who has known exactly the right attitude to take and maintain toward the pickets. A whimsical smile, slightly puckered at the roots by a sense of the ridiculous, a polite bow—and for the rest a complete ignoring of their existence. He happens to be the man around whom the little whirlwind whirls, the President of the United States.

The National American Woman Suffrage Association respectfully urges the rest of the country to take example from him in its emotional reaction to the picket question.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is being flooded with postal cards in the nature of petitions which are identically the same, only they are signed by different people. One will be inserted in the RECORD and the other thousand will be referred to the committee.

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table, and one of them was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 30, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS MARSHALL, Vice President.

HONORED SIR: In behalf of 30 members of the Christian Endeavor Society of North Milwaukee, I respectfully ask you to inform the United States Senate that we unanimously request them to support the prohibition clause of the food bill, without favor shown to beer, wine, or whisky. We ask the Senate to again show its real patriotism.

JOHN W. PARR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegram, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SYRACUSE, N. Y., June 27, 1917.

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, D. C.:

Organized labor here is not in favor of prohibition of beer, light wines in food bill. Your support would be appreciated.

STEAM ENGINEERS' UNION No. 11,
JOHN MCDONALD, Secretary,
118 East Newell Street.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegram, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINERAL POINT, MO., July 1, 1917.

SENATE CHAMBER AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.:

The Methodist church here and congregation solicit your active support for a measure that will prohibit the manufacture of alcoholic liquors for beverage purpose for the period of present war.

J. T. SELF, Pastor.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from the congregation of Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church, of Buffalo, N. Y., and from sundry citizens of California, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, praying for the exemption from taxation of bequests made to religious and charitable organizations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of E. J. Marsh and M. M. Marsh, of Concord; of Clarence E. Adams, Joseph H. Wells, David M. Boynton, M. B. Woodbury, and Frank Stone, of Lakeport; and of Franklin P. Rowell, of Newport, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of New Milford and New Haven, in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Cigar Makers' Local Union No. 39, of New Haven, Conn., remonstrating against the proposed increase in the tax on cigars, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of the First Congregational Church of Branford, of the Methodist Church of West Haven, of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Greenwich, of the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester, and of sundry citizens of Hartford, West Hartford, Danbury, Middletown, and Cornwall, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of the Civilians' Auxiliary of Excelsior; of sundry citizens of St. Cloud, Minneapolis, Sauk Center, Two Harbors, Worthington, St. Paul, Hastings, Brewster, Aitken, Mankato, Marshall, Glenwood, Duluth, and Douglas County; and of the State Conference of the Swedish Baptist Church held at Alexandria, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. I have received a large number of letters in the nature of petitions from manufacturers, merchants, and professional men of my State, asking for the adoption of national prohibition and giving their reasons therefor. I ask that the letters be received and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letters will lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. I have also received a number of letters from ministers in my State requesting the adoption of national prohibition for moral reasons and for the conservation of food, which I ask to have received and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letters will lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE presented petitions of the Hathaway Bible Class of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Warren; of the Coalbrook Sunday School, of Neffs; of the Wittenberg Bible Class, of Bellefontaine; of the Congregational Church of Dover Center; of the First Presbytery of Ohio of the United Presbyterian Church; of the United Presbyterian Church of Jamestown; of the Methodist Episcopal Sunday School of Gettysburg; of the Madison County Sunday School Association, of London; of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Flushing; of the East Zion Sabbath School, of Greenville; of the Union Sunday Schools of Darke County; of the Union Christian Endeavor Society of Decatur; of the Waterhouse Sunday School, of Ansonia; of the Champion Township Bible School Association, of Trumbull County; of the Grand River Association of Congregational Churches; of the Ministerial Association of Xenia; of the Men's Bible Class of the Presbyterian Church of Frankfort; of the United Brethren Sunday School of Heistand Chapel; of the West Grove Christian Sunday School, of Arcanum; of the Teegarden Sunday School Class, of Ansonia; of the Union Township Sunday School Convention, of Hebron; of the Ministerial Association of Bellaire; of the First Methodist Sunday School of Canton; of the Presbyterian Church of Coshocton; of the Presbytery of Philadelphia; of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Versailles; of the Woodington Sunday School, of Darke County; of the Presbytery of Maumee of Presbyterian Churches; of the First United Presbyterian Church of New Concord; of 26 churches of the Puritan Association of Congregational Churches of Ohio; of the First Presbyterian Sunday School of Sebring; of the Men's Class of Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, of Sandusky; of the Men's Bible Class of Indianola Methodist Episcopal Church, of Columbus; of the Ministerial Association of Alliance; of the First Presbyterian Church of Alliance; of the East Market Reformed Church, of Akron; of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Walnut Street Methodist Episcopal Church, of Chillicothe; of the Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, of Philadelphia, Pa.; of the South High Street Methodist Episcopal Church, of Columbus; of the Presbytery of Steubenville of Presbyterian Churches; of the First Presbyterian Sabbath School of Greenville; of the First Brethren Church of Dayton; of the Defiance College Church, of Defiance; of the Calvary Lutheran Church, of Springfield; of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Sunday School, of Youngstown; of the Methodist Episcopal Church of St. Clairville; of the Trinity Methodist Church, of Youngstown; of the Northeast Ohio Conference of Methodist Episcopal Churches of Canton District; of the Presbyterian Church of Clarkson; of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Bridgeport; of the Board of Social Service Province of the Midwest of the Episcopal Church for Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan; of the United Presbyterian Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Presbyterian Church, the Dickerson Methodist Episcopal Church, the Crabapple Presbyterian Church, and Rankin Methodist Episcopal Church, of New Athens; of the Men's Bible Class of the Church of Christ, of Utica; of the Pleasant Valley Sabbath School, of Union City; of the Presbyterian Ministerial Association of Wheeling; of the Vaughn Class of the Calvary Baptist Sunday School, of Washington, D. Christian Temperance Union, of Cincinnati; of the Sovinto Temperance Society, of Ashtabula; of the Ohio Christian Endeavor Union; of the League of Christian Women of Cincinnati; of sundry citizens of Columbiana County; of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Washington, D. C.; of the Young People's Civil League of Chicago, Ill.; of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association of Antioch College, of Yellow Springs; of sundry citizens of West Salem; of sundry citizens of Sabina; of sundry citizens of Tuscarawas County; of the Delaware County War Conservancy Committee of Fifteen; of the Commercial Exchange of Uhrichsville; of the Women's Clubs of Cook County, Ill.; of Local Union of Carpenters of Cambridge; of Gen. Putnam Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Dennison; of the Knights of Pythias of Uhrichsville; of the faculty of Heidelberg University, of Tiffin; of the faculty of Case School of Applied Science, of Cleveland; of the faculty of Baldwin-Wallace College, of Berea; of the students of Baldwin-Wallace College, of Berea; of the faculty of Kenyon College, of Gambier; of the faculty of the College of Wooster, of Wooster; of the faculty of the College of Liberal Arts of Miami University, of Oxford; of the Chamber of Commerce of East Liverpool; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Wooster; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Sandusky County; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Alliance; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Akron; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Madisonville; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Madison County; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Guernsey County; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Norwalk; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Roscoe; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Cook; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Woodsfield; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Lore City; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Oxford; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Leonardburg; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Toledo; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of South Solon; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Coshocton County; and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Fremont, all in the State of Ohio, praying for national prohibition as a measure for food conservation, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PAGE presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry citizens of Newbury, Vt., praying for the passage of the so-called food-control bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ann Arbor, Mich., and a petition of sundry citizens of the eighth district of the Michigan Christian Endeavor Society, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the economic staff of the Leland Stanford Junior University, Palo Alto, Cal., praying that taxation in preference to loans be imposed for financing the war, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

COLUMBIA RIVER IMPROVEMENT (S. DOC. NO. 57).

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document the report of the War Department on the Columbia River. It is important, because the committee are considering the river and harbor bill and we have to refer to it as a document. It will save a great deal of time and trouble if we may have it printed as a Senate document. It is very short.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear what the report contains.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is the report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on the survey of the Columbia River, a report made to the Senate Committee on Commerce. I ask to have it printed as a document, because we have to refer to it as a document in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator wants to have a thousand copies printed?

Mr. FLETCHER. No.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has a right to have a thousand copies printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. The committee can print it, but it does not become a document and take a number when printed by the committee. It has to be referred to in the act, and therefore it ought to be made a House document or a Senate document. If printed by the committee, that would be an ample supply, but it would not be official as a document.

Mr. SMOOT. But I thought if printed for the use of the committee a thousand copies would be sufficient.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not only for the use of the committee, but it is for reference in the act itself, so that the document can become official and be referred to in the act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2545) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases," approved April 22, 1908; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 2546) amending an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes," by reducing mileage from 20 cents to 5 cents per mile; to the Committee on Appropriations.

A bill (S. 2547) authorizing the payment of damages to persons for injuries inflicted by Mexican federal or insurgent troops within the United States during the insurrection in Mexico in 1911, and making appropriation therefor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and by way of preface to the statement I desire to make I ask that the Secretary read a news item in the Washington Post of Monday, July 2. I have indicated the matter I desire to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The threat contained in the statement issued yesterday by the Anti-Saloon League of America that it would renew the fight for "bone-dry" prohibition at the first favorable opportunity, regardless of the President's appeal to their patriotism, may react upon that organization and greatly lessen the influence it has wielded for years at both ends of the Capitol.

There was talk yesterday of having the Senate special lobby committee, which is still in existence, enter into a thorough investigation of this lobby, for the purpose of disclosing its campaign methods and the sources of its revenue, which, it is said, must be of unusual proportions, to carry on the elaborate campaigns and propaganda with which the league is constantly busy.

ELUDE LOBBYISTS FOR ONCE.

The committee representing this league has always had ready access to committee rooms, even when members were conferring on legislation. The subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture, which was preparing the prohibition amendment to the food bill, ordinarily would have met in the committee room yesterday. Instead, however, Senator CHAMBERLAIN invited the subcommittee to his residence. Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S telephone is not "listed," and for the first time in history the Anti-Saloon League was not able to summon members of a committee to the telephone or call them outside the committee room for a "conference."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the article in question does an injustice to the committee, to me, and to the Anti-Saloon League. There was no sort of foundation for it. As a matter of fact, what occurred was as follows: Mr. Hoover, accompanied by Judge Lindsley, who advises with him on the legal aspects of the food bill, came to see me Saturday morning just before the convening of the Senate to discuss a few proposed amendments to the bill. It was so near the hour of convening the Senate that I requested them to come up to the office Sunday morning, and promised them I would endeavor to have the members of the Agricultural Committee present so that the proposed amendments might be discussed by them.

I submitted the matter of Mr. Hoover's request to the members of the committee, and they subscribed to the following agreement:

We, members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, will meet informally with Mr. Hoover Sunday morning at 10 o'clock in the Military Affairs Committee room of the Senate to discuss with him certain features of the food-regulation bill.

GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN.	A. J. GRONNA.
WILLIAM H. THOMPSON.	JAMES H. BRADY.
T. P. GORE.	WILLIAM S. KENYON.
MORRIS SHEPPARD.	G. W. NORRIS.
HOKE SMITH.	JOHN B. KENDRICK.
E. D. SMITH.	JOSEPH E. RANSDELL.
ED. S. JOHNSON.	F. E. WARREN.

I believe the agreement was signed by every member of the committee to whom it was presented.

In pursuance of the request of the committee, a meeting was held in the Military Affairs Committee room at 10 o'clock. Mr. Hoover was present, and Judge Lindsley as well, and the proposed amendments were discussed.

There was no reason for holding the meeting in the Military Affairs Committee room except that it was the coolest place around the Capitol. There was no meeting at my residence, and no attempt was made to have the committee or any subcommittee meet anywhere except at the Military Affairs Committee room. The newspaper reporters knew my telephone number; the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture knew when the meeting was to be held and was there himself.

I make this statement because there was no effort on the part of the Anti-Saloon League or anybody representing them to appear before the committee, and nobody was asked or requested to be present except Mr. Hoover and Judge Lindsley; nor was any effort made at any time by any representative of the Anti-Saloon League to meet with the committee.

Mr. President, as indicating the attitude both of the President and the Anti-Saloon League, so far as I know anything about it, I am going to ask to have read into the RECORD a letter from the President of the United States to Dr. James Cannon, jr., chairman of the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America, and also the reply of Dr. Cannon; Mr. Baker, general superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League; Rev. Edwin C. Dinwiddie, legislative superintendent; Mr. Arthur Barton; and Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler in response to the letter of the President.

I will say, Mr. President, that I do not remember ever having met any of these gentlemen except Mr. Dinwiddie, and he has always treated me with the greatest courtesy and consideration, and has never attempted to intrude his presence upon me either as a member of the Agricultural Committee or in any other way. I think the article in question does all these distinguished gentlemen very great injustice. I ask that the letters to which I have referred may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JUNE 29, 1917.

MY DEAR DR. CANNON:

I am very glad to respond to the request of Senator MARTIN, the Democratic floor leader in the Senate, that I give your legislative committee an expression of my opinion with regard to the wisest and most patriotic policy to be purposed toward the food-administration legislation now pending in the Congress. I regard the immediate passage of the bill as of vital consequence to the safety and defense of the Nation. Time is of the essence; and yet it has become evident that heated and protracted debate will delay the passage of the bill indefinitely if the provisions affecting the manufacture of beer and wines are retained and insisted upon. In these circumstances I have not hesitated to say to Members of the Senate who have been kind enough to consult me that it would undoubtedly be in the public interest in this very critical matter if the friends of those provisions should consent to their elimination from the present measure. Feeling that your committee is actuated by the same pratriotic motives which inspire me, I am confident that these considerations will seem to you, as they seem to me, to be imperative.

With much respect, sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Rev. JAMES CANNON, Jr., D. D.,
Chairman Legislative Committee Anti-Saloon League of America.

JUNE 30, 1917.

To the PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.:

We have earnestly considered the statement in your letter of yesterday to the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America, that in the face of the present food crisis you are greatly concerned lest the early passage of the food administration legislation now pending in Congress be jeopardized by a heated and protracted debate upon certain sections of the bill relating to the manufacture of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquors.

We are aware of the threats made by the friends of beer and wine in the Senate of an indefinite and protracted filibuster against those provisions of the bill. We beg to assure you that as patriotic Americans, determined to uphold you as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in the present war, we will not for our constituence offer any obstruction to the prompt passage of the food-control bill.

Of course we can not presume to indicate to Members of Congress what action they should take in view of this request from the President of the United States. They will doubtless act in accordance with their convictions of duty.

We are glad to note that your request applies only to the pending food-administration legislation. It will be our purpose to urge the passage of legislation probibiting the waste of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beer and wines, at the earliest possible date, either in the form of a separate bill or in connection with other war legislation.

We assure you of our purpose as patriotic American citizens to cooperate in every possible way in the winning of the great war in which our Nation is engaged.

Sincerely and respectfully, yours,

P. A. BAKER,
General Superintendent.
EDWIN C. DINWIDDIE,
Legislative Superintendent.
JAMES CANNON, Jr.,
ARTHUR BARTON,
WAYNE B. WHEELER,
Legislative Committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in pursuance of the call of the members of the committee for the meeting yesterday, the committee met and discussed some of the proposed amendments, and adjourned to meet again this morning at 10 o'clock. The amendments which were suggested by the committee will be reported to the Senate in due course. The committee, not by unanimous consent, but by a majority of the members present, have agreed upon a substitute for the liquor provision in the bill. I desire at this time to have it read into the RECORD so that Senators may know what has been done with respect to it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he knows whether or not the President made the request of the patriotic Senators who opposed this prohibition feature of the bill to withdraw their opposition in order that the bill might pass.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the foregoing letter contains all I know about the President's views. I have not had any communication with or from him on the subject, and the letter which has just been read covers all I know about his views. I ask that the proposed amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the manufacture of distilled spirits for beverage purposes. (b) Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such liquors is essential, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food or feed, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall have been given and shall remain unrevoked, no person shall, after a reasonable time, which shall be prescribed in such notice, use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of such vinous, malt, or fermented liquors except in accordance with the limitations, regulations, and prohibitions prescribed in such notice, or to produce any such liquors having an alcoholic content in excess of the amount prescribed therefor in such notice. When the question arises as to whether any particular product is suitable for food or feed, the question shall be determined by the President and his determination shall be conclusive for the purposes of this section (c) Except as otherwise herein provided, the Commissioner of Irternal Revenue shall be charged with the administration of this section, and he is authorized, with the approval of the President, to require the taking out of such permits, the keeping of such records, the execution of such bonds, and the observance of such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the execution of the same. (d) Any person who willfully violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President. I wish to ask permission out of order, and I think it is pertinent at this time, to have a telegram read, addressed to me from the Anti-Saloon League of Mississippi, and my reply thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JACKSON, MISS., July 1, 1917.

Senator J. K. VARDAMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

We are depending on you to do your best for a bone-dry war measure. Do not exempt beer and wine.

MISSISSIPPI ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE,
Per T. J. BAILEY, Superintendent.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 1, 1917.

Rev. T. J. BAILEY,
Superintendent Anti-Saloon League, Jackson, Miss.:

Your telegram received.

The good old ship Prohibition, heavily loaded with the hopes of millions of consecrated women and men for Nation-wide prohibition, sailing with fair winds and good prospects to the port of victory, was submarined day before yesterday by the President of the United States. It is now lying on the bottom beneath about 40 fathoms of beer and wine, with one whole side knocked out. I am afraid some of the officers of the crew deserted before it went down. Will do my best to save the wreck. But it is my deliberate judgment that no power on earth except the people can raise it.

JAMES K. VARDAMAN.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the unfinished business before the Senate has been pretty generally discussed. I do not know of any Senator who desires to make a set speech on the bill, and in the hope that we may be able to reach an early vote on it, and in line with the suggestion which was made last Friday, I now submit the following unanimous-consent agreement. Before suggesting the absence of a quorum in order to have it submitted I thought if there was opposition to it such opposition might be indicated by some Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Tuesday, July 3, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 4961, a bill to provide further for the national security and defense, etc., through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that during said day, Tuesday, July 3, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. PENROSE. I object to any unanimous-consent agreement on the bill at the present time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask if the Senator will suggest a time that will suit?

Mr. PENROSE. A little later, perhaps, after the Fourth of July we may be able to come to an agreement, but there are a number of very important amendments pending to the bill, and I personally am not willing to agree to a time to vote on the measure until they can be discussed a little.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask——

Mr. PENROSE. It is not a question of the bill alone; it is a question of the number of amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Would the Senator from Pennsylvania be willing to consent to fixing a later date, say, the 5th or 6th of July?

Mr. PENROSE. I am not willing this morning to agree to fixing any date for a vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask the Senator, would he be willing to limit debate?

Mr. PENROSE. I would not, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it is quite essential that this bill be disposed of as soon as possible, for we all realize its importance. I do hope that the Senator from Pennsylvania will shortly agree to a time when we can dispose of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, I will, perhaps. Mr. President, of course, it is needless for me to say that I have no desire to delay the bill, but it is a very important measure. The bill itself is harmless compared with some of the amendments which are pending and which will have to be discussed. I hope the Senator from Oregon will bring up his request to-morrow or after the 4th of July.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think the Senate ought to continue the consideration of this bill through the 4th of July.

Mr. PENROSE. All right; that suits me. Of course there will not be a vote on the 4th of July, for there will hardly be a quorum here on that day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, there may be.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. It is very important that this bill be acted upon as soon as possible and I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if it would not be possible to call up amendments that would cause debate and have them first disposed of? There are only a few such amendments.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I can not hear what the Senator from Kansas is saying, because there is so much confusion around me.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], if it would not be possible to arrange for the consideration of the contested amendments? There are only a few such amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The order of business now is the reading of the bill for committee amendments. I should like to have that proceeded with, or we might pass over contested amendments and dispose of those about which there is no contest.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the objection is not so much to committee amendments as to some amendments which are pending, which have been offered by individual Senators.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the reading of the bill will be resumed for committee amendments. Let us dispose of those in regular order. If there are any about which there is likely to be a great deal of discussion, they may be temporarily passed over; and we could, I think, adopt a great many amendments which have been reported to the bill.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I understand that the order under which we are proceeding is to the effect that committee amendments shall first be considered. I have an amendment which I shall desire to offer later; and, if the Senator in charge of the bill does not object, I should like to present it now, in order that it may appear in the RECORD, be printed, and laid on the desks of Senators for their consideration before it can be reached.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That may be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. President, I request that we proceed with the reading of the bill for committee amendments.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the amendment which I have submitted be read before we proceed as suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the proper place in the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. The sum of $2,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to aid in the support and proper maintenance of educational sanitariums or other like institutions organized for the care and industrial education of soldiers and sailors of the United States who have been crippled or disabled as a result of injuries received in the line of duty. The President is hereby authorized and empowered to distribute said funds, hereby appropriated, to such sanitariums or other like institutions in such amounts and in such manner as in his judgment will best promote the purposes for which this appropriation is made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. KNOX. I send to the desk and ask to have printed a proposed amendment to the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GORE. I desire to give notice of an amendment which I intend to offer, and I ask that it be printed without reading and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

Mr. CALDER. I desire to give notice of my intention to offer an amendment to section 3 of the bill, which I desire to have printed and laid on the table, to be offered when the proper time arrives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be taken.

The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I understood the other day, when we were considering the first section of the bill, that amendments to the committee amendments were in order, and I was about to offer an amendment when an executive session was moved and taken. I desire to offer the amendment now, and I ask the attention of the Senator who is in charge of the bill. The point at which I offer the amendment will be found at the bottom of page 1, in the last line, line 9, where "petroleum and its products" are proposed to be brought under the purview of this legislation. It is well known that petroleum is used in the manufacture of a great many articles which have no relation whatsoever to the purposes of this bill. For instance, "petroleum and its products" include medicines, candles, cosmetics, and various other preparations. I therefore move to amend the bill, on page 1, line 9, by inserting after the word "its," at the bottom of the page, the word "fuel," so that it will read "including petroleum and its fuel products."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is this a committee amendment which has just been offered? There is so much confusion in the Chamber that I could not hear what was proposed to be done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This is not a committee amendment. I am seeking to amend a committee amendment, because the committee amendment, in my humble judgment, reaches an absurdity.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator from New York state the page and line where he proposes the amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I propose an amendment on page 1, in the last line on that page, line 9.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the proposed amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from New York state his proposed amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to amend, on line 9, page 1, after the word "its," by inserting the word "fuel," so that it will read "including petroleum and its fuel products," on the assumption that it is not the intention of Congress to take control over the manufacture and distribution of cosmetics, medicines, candles, and a host of other by-products.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, would not that exclude from the control of the bill oils that are ordinarily used in mechanical processes and for mechanical purposes?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator mean lubricating oils?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it would; and I am averse to having them included. I think the matter of lubricating oils is one which does not need regulation by the Congress of the United States. I understood that the word "petroleum" was put in there in order to reach fuel oils and gasoline, and I want it limited to that purpose.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, of course the great question is whether any of these things ought to be put in; but if any of them should be put in, I can not see why the axle grease used by the farmer on his wagon and machinery, the ordinary lubricating oils, and other similar products of petroleum, ought to be excluded merely because there are included some other products like cosmetics, that the Senator referred to. I think he used that word.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me suggest to the Senator from Missouri, how would it do to insert the word "fuel," as suggested by the Senator from New York, and to add the words "power-producing and lubricating"? That would cover the items that the Senator desires to have limited to certain kinds of oil that are being used, as the Senator from Missouri suggests.

Mr. REED. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Oregon would cure the defect I have mentioned. Of course, I understand perfectly well that any representative of the great State of New York could not well tolerate the passage of a bill that would limit the price of anything entering into cosmetics, but I hope the Senator will allow us to have a limitation upon oils used in machinery. Seriously speaking, I understand the purpose of the Senator, and it is probably a very wise one, unless we go to the extent of saying that the price of one thing being controlled, we must control the price of everything, or substantially everything. However, with the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oregon, who is in charge of the bill, to the amendment, I would have no objection, if that is agreeable to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think that the catalogue of articles here is too extensive, and it was my purpose to limit to some reasonable boundaries the jurisdiction the Government is to have over these articles. Certainly the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oregon is preferable to the committee amendment as it is now written, and I shall not raise any further objection. I do think, however, it is stretching things too far to regulate the production and distribution of axle grease.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. I am not familiar with the various products that are made from petroleum; and, inasmuch as the Senator has, no doubt, examined into the question pretty thoroughly and knows what the limitation would be, I should like to ask him what products would be excluded by the insertion of the word "fuel"? In other words, what products of petroleum are there other than fuel products?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I understand that petroleum or its by-products go into the manufacture of medicine. I am quite sure also that they go into the manufacture of candles. I know that some preparations of petroleum are used for binding material on highways. There are various other products; I can not catalogue them all, but it certainly can not be the intention of Congress to go into such minute details as these.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thought the Senator had in mind some particular product that he thought ought not to be included, and that he would enumerate them so that we could better pass upon the question according to our judgment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have endeavored already to enumerate those which came to my attention and my memory. My idea was that the Congress really intended to control the distribution of fuel, such as gasoline and fuel oils. If it wants to add lubricating oils, very well; I think it is going too far; but I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have no doubt at all that lubricating oil ought to be included. That commodity is used to a very large extent by our farmers in connection with the operation of their agricultural machinery, binders, reapers, and all that; and there is as much reason for controlling lubricating oils as there is for controlling fuel oils. I am very glad that the Senator from New York has accepted the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

I want to state further to the Senator from Colorado that a great many medicinal preparations are derived from petroleum and its by-products. I can recall several medicinal preparations which are prepared and derived directly from this substance. For instance, there is a remedy which is called sulphonal, which is administered to bring sleep to a patient who is unable to sleep. That preparation is made of petroleum, and there are a great number of other medicines into the composition of which petroleum in one form or another enters.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desired to obtain information concerning the amendment. It is very dangerous to insert a word limiting the application of the bill in connection with so great a product as petroleum. I wanted to know what products would be excluded by inserting the word "fuel" before the word "products." If there are other uses for this material which should not be included under the bill, as the Senator from Minnesota indicates, especially those of a medicinal nature, I can not see why the limitation should not be made; but the proposition of inserting a word or two without having any consideration of the matter or without having the committee pass upon it, or, perhaps, having experts pass upon it, is somewhat dangerous. Therefore I made the inquiry.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to say further to the Senator from Colorado that many dyestuff preparations are derived from petroleum. It is used not only in medicinal preparations but to a great extent in the making of dyestuffs.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It would be very well to except them from the scope of the bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say that there are some 140 products of petroleum, and they cover a great range.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I desire to ask him if nearly all of those by-products of petroleum are not important articles of necessity, ranging from the component parts of medicines to materials employed in the arts and in the industries?

Mr. GORE. Of course, some of the products are undoubtedly indispensable necessities or necessaries, but they would vary in their degree of necessity or desirability. I presume, possibly, cosmetics would not be included in that category, but undoubtedly power-producing products would be, and perhaps others.

Mr. REED. Are not these by-products used in the production of dyestuffs?

Mr. GORE. They are; yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GORE. Parafine is a by-product; and a great many things are made of parafine.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Oklahoma takes his seat I should like to ask him whether in this list of 140 by-products of petroleum there are any products which are the subjects now of a trust, in the sale of which exorbitant prices are charged, or in connection with which perhaps agreements to limit production have been made?

Mr. GORE. Undoubtedly some of these products, and perhaps all in a way, have been subject to the control of the Standard Oil Trust. I think that is a matter of judicial decision. Undoubtedly those who control the oil industry have control of these by-products. Some of them are of little consequence, while others are of primary importance.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask this question: If it is wise to give the Government control of the greater part of this industry, which is practically all controlled by one general organization, does the Senator know of any good reason why we should not give the Government control of all of its products?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that is a mere matter of policy as to how expansive this bill and the control instituted in pursuance of this bill are to be made. Of course, if it is made universal, these things ought to be included. Some of them, as I have said, are primary necessaries beyond any doubt, such as petroleum, gasoline, and perhaps kerosene. There are four products of particular importance resulting from petroleum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment as it now stands.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "its," it is proposed to insert the words "fuel, power-producing, and lubricating," so that it will read:

Including petroleum and its fuel, power-producing, and lubricating products.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York as modified to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. JAMES] is absent on important business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent on important business. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness, and will let this announcement stand for the day. My colleague has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. REED (after having voted in the negative). I neglected to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will let my vote stand, and on all votes for to-day I announce the same transfer of my pair.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. As that Senator has not voted, I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained on important public business; and also that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 46, as follows:

So Mr. WADSWORTH's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move to amend the committee amendment by adding, after the word "lumber," in line 3, page 2, the words "or the joint product or products of two or more of said materials."

I may suggest that the people of the country are really more interested in the joint products, for instance, of steel and lumber, than they are in steel as a separate material or lumber as a separate material. The committee has attempted to take care of a large class of these joint products by the use of the words "farm implements and machinery," but it is quite evident that farm implements and machinery do not embrace a very large list of very important products, and it is to supply that omission that I have offered the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 3, in the committee amendment, after the word "lumber," it is proposed to insert "or the joint product or products of two or more of the said materials."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I can understand what the Senator means in so far as his amendment refers to steel, for example, but, with my limited knowledge, I do not understand just what he means by the joint products of lumber.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can easily see how the Senator could not understand that, but the amendment does not provide for the joint product of lumber. It provides for the joint product of two or more of these materials. It would take lumber and something else to make two.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Because of the absence of my pair, the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Upon the last vote I voted by inadvertence, thinking that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have a pair, was present. Of course, under the rules of the Senate I can not withdraw the vote that I then cast, but I wanted to explain it. Upon this vote I transfer the pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote "yea."

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I move that a comma be inserted after the word "jute" on line 2, page 2 of the bill, and then that the word "cotton" be inserted, so that it will read "hemp, jute, cotton, sisal, and their products."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Page 2, line 2, in the committee amendment after the word "jute" insert a comma and the word "cotton."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do I understand that the amendment by inserting the word "cotton" would involve the Government in attempting to regulate the production and distribution of cotton clothing?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand it would give the Government power to regulate anything made of cotton and cotton itself just as much as it regulates the other products.

I will say, Mr. President, that I move this amendment in part owing to the statement made by the Senator from Florida the other day, who called our attention to the fact that the cotton crop would be a short crop in all probability this year, and that the price was quite high. I can hardly imagine an article which is more necessary to the successful conduct of the war than cotton and its products, because it lies at the base of the manufacture of high explosives and no article is more universally used for clothing, tents, uniforms, and all sorts of military equipment than cotton.

Of course if the bill was simply to handle the food question, and had been confined to handling the food question, I would not offer the amendment, but inasmuch as the Senate in its wisdom has seen fit to include containers of food, and petroleum and its products, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, lead, timber, lumber, farm implements, machinery and fertilizers, I can see no valid distinction and no line of demarcation that would allow us to exclude cotton.

I have offered to include cotton. I think wool also ought to go in perhaps, but I thought perhaps there would be a better chance by offering these articles separately.

Mr. POMERENE. Would the Senator include goat hair also?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know much about goats. The Senator from Ohio can offer that amendment if he desires.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not add cotton to the commodities which have been included in the bill. The committee went the limit in undertaking to comply with the demands of Senators on the floor that the word "necessaries" ought to be defined in some way. The committee included those things which were essential to the production of crops in this country and did not go any further than that. It was not particularly a war measure except in that it was the purpose to assist and aid in the production and distribution of the commodities which enter into the life of the people. I do not think the bill ought to be extended. If we start to extend it, it will fall of its own weight.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, Is there not as much necessity, indeed is there not a greater necessity, for including cotton and wool than including copper? Cotton and wool are indispensable to clothing the Army, and clothing the people for that matter. We all know that there have been enormous profits, indeed there has been profiteering in the control of the wool and the cotton products of the country. It seems to me if there is any wisdom, any necessity, any argument in favor of putting lead and copper under the control of the Government, there is as much necessity and as great a reason, if not a greater one, to place wool and cotton under the control of the Government. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he will kindly answer why the committee placed copper upon the list and why they did not include cotton and wool?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am not prepared to disagree entirely with the view of the Senator from Utah that possibly cotton and wool are just as essential as are copper and some of the other commodities mentioned in the bill. I think myself that some could be eliminated. I think it would be better by a process of elimination to exclude all and go back to the original words employed in the bill and use the term "necessaries used for the production of food products." But the committee in its wisdom saw fit to add these items, and some of them thought they were acting in direct accord with the wishes of the Senate as expressed in the discussion here. However, Mr. President, I think the bill has extended these commodities as far as they ought to be extended, and possibly too far, and I do not think anything else ought to be added to it. I think it would be very much better to exclude rather than to add to the terms now contained in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. Making the same announcement of my pair and transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS. Making the same transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator and withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. May I inquire if the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I withhold my vote, having a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He is absent from the Chamber on this roll call. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 23, as follows:

So Mr. BRANDEGEE's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move to amend by adding after the word copper, page 2, line 2, a comma and the word "wool."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is apparent that there is just as much reason for including in the bill wool and its products as there is cotton and its products. There are two ways of defeating legislation. One of them is by openly opposing it, voting it down directly; the other is by loading it with impracticable amendments so that nobody will want it.

Mr. President, I wish to state in making this observation I do not refer to the Senator from Alabama. I have already stated that if cotton and its products should be in the bill wool and its products might likewise upon the same basis go into it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Cotton is already in.

Mr. ROBINSON. Cotton is already in the bill, but I want to point out to the friends of the measure, if it has any friends here, that there is danger of destroying it by putting so many amendments upon the bill that it can not become operative, so that its enforcement will occasion annoyance and inconvenience to the public without corresponding benefits.

This measure is presented as necessary to the successful conduct of the war by our Government.

The primary purpose of this legislation as it was originally proposed was to protect the Government and the public against exhorbitant prices primarily of products that are indispensable to the conduct of the war. Now, it seems that the policy of some Senators is to make the terms of the bill so comprehensive that there will be a control of the price of almost every product. If Congress thinks that is the thing to do, if the advocates of this legislation believe it is proper to so broaden it, it may be right to support this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does it include wool and its products?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I leave out the words "its products."

Mr. ROBINSON. Because "its products" are included in the language already adopted.

Mr. President, the purpose of this food-control bill is a great one and a good one. The American people are for it, in my judgment, and Congress is for it, but you can destroy this measure by loading it with amendments, making it so top-heavy that it can not be operated at all.

Is it the purpose of the Senate to provide a control of the price of everything? If so, then let us say so in general terms; that would be the sensible thing to do.

I want to resent statements that I have heard on the floor here around me, made by Senators, "Oh, you put in one thing; now, to retailiate, let us put in something else." I have heard the imputation made around me on the floor in the last few minutes that Senators were voting against putting cotton into the bill because it is a southern product, and that other Senators were voting against putting wool in because it is a western product and is produced in districts which western Senators represent. I hope there is no one in the Senate who could be moved by a motive of that sort.

You are, however, destroying this bill; you are making Congress appear absurd and ridiculous. The American people are already criticizing from every quarter of this country the United States Senate for the manner in which we have dealt with this bill, or rather, have failed to deal with it. God have mercy on you if you continue the course of delay that has been followed here during the last two weeks. If you are for this bill, stand for it; if you are against it, vote against it; but do not try to load it down.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I voted to include cotton in the provisions of this bill; I could see no good reason why cotton should be exempted because it is a product of my section of the country, when we are including every other essential which is necessary to the prosecution of the war. We have included wheat; we have included nearly all other agricultural products, and cotton is just as essential and just as necessary to the successful prosecution of the war as is either wheat or meat.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Alabama yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Alabama also think that leather and its products should be included?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do; and I am going to move that they be included.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me ask the Senator another question: Does the Senator think that this bill should embrace all the articles which are useful and necessary in the conduct of the war?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, I would not say "all," but I should say the principal ones, those that are absolutely necessary to the successful conduct of the war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Idaho, if he desires to ask me a question.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will.

Mr. BORAH. A few days ago I offered an amendment to this bill authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to fix prices, naming certain articles, but permitting the President to designate from time to time such other articles as to which he deemed it essential to have the price fixed. It seems to me, if I may be permitted to say so at this time, that it would be better to have some tribunal which can be called upon to fix prices in case it is necessary to fix prices of the articles than to undertake to incorporate everything in this bill.

I agree with the Senator from Alabama that unless we have some price-fixing tribunal, which can be called upon when the emergency arises to fix prices, there is no reason why cotton and wool should not be included in this bill, because they are both essential, in my judgment, and should be controlled; but it does occur to me that instead of undertaking to insert everything in this bill we ought to create a price-fixing tribunal, which can be called upon from time to time as the emergency arises, to fix prices upon the things which the Government will need or which it may be necessary to fix the prices on because of the high prices being charged the people.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should not object to the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho; but I assume that the article of cotton will be controlled by the same regulations and under the same regulations that all these other essential products are, whatever they may be. Cotton is a product of my section of the country; it is our chief product, just as wheat is the chief product of some other sections of the country, and as wool is the chief product of some other sections of the country, all of which are absolutely necessary to the successful prosecution of the war. You can not make munitions, you can not make explosives, and there are a great many other things that you can not successfully manufacture without the use of cotton. That being true, I can see no reason why cotton should not be included as one of the products to be included in the bill. I can certainly see no reason why wool also should not be included. I hope that my amendment may be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In line 2, page 2, after the first word, "products," I move to insert the words "hides, skins."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the first word, "products," it is proposed to insert "hides, skins."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to suggest, simply in the interest of simplicity of construction, that we can strike out in two places the words "and their products," and string these enumerated articles together in this form:

Steel, iron, copper, hemp, jute, cotton, wool, hides, skins, sisal, and their products.

Mr. REED. Before we come to that, I think, if the Senator from Connecticut will withhold that amendment, which is merely a matter of form more than of substance——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; it is only a suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws his amendment for the present at the request of the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. REED. I move to insert, on page 2, line 1, after the words "copper and its products," in the committee amendment, the words "aluminum and its products."

Mr. President, if there is any amendment that ought to be adopted to this bill, I think it is the one I have offered. If there is anything that ought to be included in the bill as an original proposition, it is the one I have offered. I hold in my hand a transcript of the testimony of Mr. Davis, given before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives on June 6, 1917.

Mr. Davis appears in the list of the cooperative committees of the Council of National Defense, which was put into the RECORD by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. On page 61 of the document, which was published on the request of the Senator from Nevada, we find—and I should like to call the attention of the Senate to this—that the cooperative committee on aluminum is composed of—

Arthur V. Davis, president Aluminum Co. of America, Pittsburgh, Pa., chairman; E. E. Allyne, president Aluminum Castings Co., Cleveland, Ohio; Joseph A. Janney, jr., Morris Building, Philadelphia, Pa. (partner in Janney, Steinmetz & Co.).

This is the advisory or cooperative committee of the Council of National Defense which is to deal with the subject of aluminum for the Government or on behalf of the Government of the United States. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read this testimony, but I shall make some statements with reference to it and invite the attention of Senators to the record iself in order that they may, if they desire, either challenge or verify what I am about to say.

It appears that Mr. Davis is the president of the Aluminum Co. of America; that there are a number of subsidiary companies, but all of them are controlled by the one parent company. It further appears that this company controls absolutely the aluminum business of the United States; that there is no competition whatsover from abroad at this time; that it has at least one branch in Canada; and it is stated by some, though I do not assert it as shown by this record, that the company practically controls the aluminum business of the world. I do not state that, however, as a fact.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me just a suggestion there?

Mr. REED. I will.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is entirely correct in his statement; but he ought to go a little further. Not only do they control it but they created the business and made aluminum commercially possible to the people of the United States and of civilization.

Mr. REED. Suppose we admit that, what I am saying about these gentlemen is not in the form of an attack; it is in the form of a statement of facts.

Mr. PENROSE. They are not ordinary monopolists, because they are the creators of the industry.

Mr. REED. Well, possibly. So it might almost be said that John D. Rockefeller was the creator of the oil industry.

This company, according to the testimony, is capitalized at $20,000,000, but an examination of the evidence will show that its entire primary investment was $1,000,000. An examination of the evidence of Mr. Davis further will show that last year they made a profit of $20,000,000. So it appears now that this great necessity, which must be used in the conduct of this war, which is second perhaps in importance to the two products, steel and copper, is under the complete domination and control of one corporation, and it further appears that that corporation is represented upon the Council of National Defense by its president and by other officers of the company.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, an examination of the subcommittees and advisory committees of the Council of National Defense will show that what the Senator is stating with reference to this particular product is substantially true of practically all of the commodities which it will be essential to use in this war; in other words, the subcommittees represent the products which are essential for the Government to have at some time if the war is to be carried on at all.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Excuse me just a moment. That being true, could anything be more evident than that we must have somewhere in this machinery an impartial, uncontrolled price-fixing tribunal? I have suggested the Federal Trade Commission, but so many Senators have objected to the Federal Trade Commission for one reason or another—generally one reason—that perhaps it will be necessary to substitute some other tribunal. I am not partial to the Federal Trade Commission, and have no particular desire to load upon it any unnecessary duties in addition to those which it already has to perform; but some impartial price-fixing tribunal ought to be created. If that is not true, we are going to have from the beginning of the war to its close a condition under which it will appear to the public that those who are interested in the articles are fixing their own price upon the articles which they are selling to the Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator is exceedingly interesting, but I desire to complete my statement with reference to the Aluminum Co.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GORE. I rose a moment ago to ask the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and I should now like to ask him or the Senator from Missouri whether this instance in relation to Mr. Davis is mentioned as typical of the advisory board and its purchasing committees or as unique?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was dealing with the case in hand. The case in hand is my motion to include aluminum and its products. I was calling attention to the condition with reference to aluminum and its products. I am sticking to my case; but since the Senator invites me out of the record, I might say that, of course, it is indisputable that practically all the big trusts and monopolies have mobilized in the Munsey Building, and while the boys from the farms, the factories, and the banking houses in all parts of the country are being mobilized in military camps to be later sent to the trenches in foreign lands these gentlemen, who control products which the Government must use, are making contracts for their own use, enrichment, and benefit, the particular evidence of which I am now about to submit with reference to the aluminum company, finding the evidence in the open statement of the president of that company.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Have these committees of business men in the Munsey Building, to whom the Senator refers, any legal power to make Government contracts?

Mr. REED. Not in the least.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My purpose in asking that question is to emphasize what seems to me to be the fact—that if they are allowed to make Government contracts, having no authority of law to do so, the responsibility for the abuses that would grow out of such a manifestly improper situation rests upon the heads of the various executive departments of the Government in whom rests the legal power and the legal responsibility for these matters.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, lest the statement I made a moment ago might be misconstrued, let me say that when I state that these men are making contracts for their own benefit I do not mean that they actually sign the contract on behalf of the Government. I mean that they have an inside advantage. I mean that their recommendations are largely taken by those who do have authority to sign. I mean that a condition of facts has been created by which these men are practically placed in control.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED. If the Senators will bear with me——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I just wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri, with the permission of the Senator from Washington, to an editorial in the Washington Post of this morning, bearing upon this very question.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator withhold it until I have concluded my statement, and then put it in?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I shall be glad to; but I just want in this connection to say that I have not words in which to express my admiration and commendation of the stand that Secretary Baker has taken to prevent just the thing that the Senator from Missouri is animadverting upon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I hope he will include also Secretary Daniels.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, this is an editorial commending Mr. Secretary Baker's position. But I thank the able Senator from Utah for the suggestion. It is a pleasure always to me to commend official efficiency and fidelity to duty in public station. Many things in the administration of Mr. Secretary Daniels have occurred to challenge my admiration and command approval.

Mr. REED. I desire to have it in; but for the sake of continuity I should like to dispose of this aluminum case just at this moment.

I call attention—and I shall be as brief as I possibly can—to a statement of Mr. Davis's, made during his examination as a witness. Remember, Mr. Davis is the president of the Aluminum Co. Mr. Rogers is asking the questions:

> What percentage of the total production of aluminum in the United States is attributable to your company?
> Mr. DAVIS. All of it. We are the only manufacturers of aluminum in the United States.

Again, at page 14 of the transcript, after describing what aluminum is, that it comes from a product named bauxite, Mr. Davis states:

> When the war broke out about 40 per cent, on an average, of the aluminum consumption of this country was imported, being manufactured by foreign competitors. This importation was substantially cut off, and we realized that our facilities would not be sufficient to supply the normal consumption of this country, for naturally we had only plant enough to supply the trade which we had been able to take away in competition from the foreign people. Fortunately, however, we were just about bringing into operation a very considerable increase in our production, so that we have been enabled to take care very well of the domestic consumption of this country.

I read that in order that there may be no question but that the company controls the entire production—all that is sold.

A little later, on page 22 of the transcript, the statement is made that the Government itself can not secure aluminum except from this company. I read the question of Mr. Porter and the answer of Mr. Davis:

> Mr. PORTER. They—
> Meaning the Government—
> could not make the canteens without buying the aluminum from your company, could they?

And that is true also of every factory in the United States.

> Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Then the question is taken up of certain plants that are engaged in fabricating aluminum, and it transpires that they are controlled by this company; and Mr. Davis, speaking of that, says:

> I am not very familiar with the fabricating business; but we pursue the policy of selling to ourselves, as it were, and to all other makers at uniform prices; so that if we make a camping outfit we must sell such a camping outfit in competition with anybody else.
> Mr. PORTER. But they would have to buy their aluminum from you to make it, would they not?
> Mr. DAVIS. We sell to our company—our fabricating company—at the same price at which we sell to other people, and make our figures on that basis. As a matter of fact, our fabricating company's profits average, I think, about 14 per cent, which is no more than a fair manufacturing profit.

Mr. President, there is more testimony of this kind; and the fact will not be disputed that the company has an absolute monopoly of the business in the United States. Now, Mr. President, what has it been doing with the Government? There are many places in the record to which I could refer if I wanted to take the time; but I call attention to page 17 of the transcript, in which this statement is made:

You will see, therefore, that the statement or impression that we are selling our product to the United States consumers at 60 cents a pound is as erroneous as such a statement could possibly be.

I am reading part of an answer, because I do not want to take time to read it all.

I might add in this connection that on the breaking out of the war between the United States and Germany we offered the entire Government requirements to the United States Government at the price of 27½ cents per pound, and we are delivering all the requirements of the United States at this price. This price was submitted to the National Council of Defense and was by them submitted to the Bureau of Ordnance, and I would refer you gentlemen to the records, which are open to your inspection, in which it is stated, first, by the Bureau of Ordnance to the munitions board that this price is satisfactory to them, and, second, the reply of the munitions board to the Bureau of Ordnance that they consider the price satisfactory. I might also say that we have been told by many people, either in the Council of National Defense or otherwise, that they consider the price eminently satisfactory under the circumstances. This price was arrived at by taking the average price for 10 years preceding the war, which was 25½ cents per pound, and adding thereto 2 cents per pound as a partial compensation for the increased cost of manufacturing under present conditions as compared with prewar conditions.

Now, that applies to the raw material, the raw aluminum, if I may use that term; but coming along a little further is this:

Mr. PORTER. Does your company control the companies that manufacture aluminum into various utensils?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no. We have facilities ourselves for manufacturing various things out of aluminum, but there are hundreds of companies that buy aluminum from us or else from European producers and make articles out of aluminum.

Mr. PORTER. Is the cost of making aluminum into utensils as great as that, for instance, of steel or tin plate?

Mr. DAVIS. It is about the same as would be the case in making a similar utensil out of brass or copper.

Mr. PORTER. Well, would that be greater or less than tin plate?

Mr. DAVIS. It would be greater.

Mr. PORTER. How much greater?

Mr. DAVIS. It is very difficult to answer that question in a general way, but perhaps twice as much.

Mr. PORTER. I have this in mind: What does a canteen weigh?

Mr. DAVIS. An ordinary canteen weighs a little over half a pound. We have an order for 1,000,000 canteens, or at least we are making 1,000,000 canteens, with the expectation of getting an order in due course of time.

I am sorry the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] went out, because this bears upon the particular way in which these contracts are made.

This witness says:

We have an order for 1,000,000 canteens, or at least we are making 1,000,000 canteens, with the expectation of getting an order in due course of time; but inasmuch as it was necessary for somebody to make canteens and take the risk, we volunteered to make the canteens, and presumably we will, in due course of time, receive an order for them.

Now, who doubts that he knows what he is doing?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? I did not hear at the beginning what was the proceeding before which this tesimony was given, and who is the witness testifying. May I trouble the Senator to let me know as to that?

Mr. REED. The witness is the president of the Aluminum Co. of America, Mr. Arthur V. Davis, testifying before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. I continue reading:

In making these canteens we include the ingot aluminum at 27½ cents a pound and add the cost of fabrication—that is, first, of rolling the aluminum into sheets and afterwards of forming the sheets into canteens and furnishing the various accessories which go with them, the straps, and so on.

Mr. PORTER. I do not care for all of those details; I merely want the price to the Government.

Mr. DAVIS. I was going to say that this fabricating cost, which is added to the 27½ cents a pound, is something less than the fabricating cost at the Rock Island Arsenal.

Mr. PORTER. Well, I would like to know the price that you fix in the sales to the Government.

Mr. DAVIS. The price per canteen?

Mr. PORTER. Yes; or per dozen, or thousand, or gross, or however you sell them.

Mr. FINNEY. It is 91 cents, I think, with the cup.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it is 74 cents for the canteen and cup complete.

Mr. MILLER. Does that include the cover on the aluminum canteen—that is, the cloth cover?

Mr. DAVIS. No; these canteens are not covered.

Mr. PORTER. No; the cover comes from Europe, or did.

Mr. FINNEY. The cover is supplied by the Rock Island Arsenal.

And so on.

Then Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH says:

Is the price of 74 cents which you quote the price that prevails on an order of 1,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. That is the price on an order of 1,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. You say you anticipate an order?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; we have told the Government what we would make 1,000,000 canteens for.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. And that is the price?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; and that, as I say, is a price which the records at the Rock Island Arsenal will show it will be impossible for the Rock Island Arsenal to meet, even if they were given the aluminum at 27½ cents per pound.

And so forth. I omit some parts of this as immaterial at this time.

Mr. PORTER. They—

could not make the canteens without buying the aluminum from your company, could they?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Then they take up the question of the Kensington plant, near Pittsburgh, and that turns out to be one of this company's plants. Then follows the testimony that I read first.

There follow descriptions of the methods of manufacturing and the place of manufacturing. The statement follows that they have a company called the Northern Aluminum Co., which operates in Canada, and which is owned by this same concern, and that that company is capitalized at $500,000. I read this question:

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Have you any subsidiary companies?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes, sir; we have quite a number. Our various power companies are subsidiary companies, and we have one or two short railroads, and so on.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Have you subsidiary manufacturing companies?

Mr. DAVIS. We have the United States Aluminum Co., which is the company to which I have referred as being our manufacturing company; that is the company which fabricates the aluminum into canteens and other such articles.

Then he is asked to put in a list of the subsidiary companies, and so forth.

Now I come to the question of capital:

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The total capitalization of your concern, with all of its subsidiaries, is $80,000,000, I believe you said?

Mr. DAVIS. No; I said the total investment of our company and its subsidiaries is $80,000,000.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That includes all subsidiaries?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What distinction do you make between that and capitalization?

Mr. DAVIS. The capitalization is the authorized capital stock, which is $20,000,000.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The balance represents securities outstanding, does it?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; the balance represents investments in plants, etc.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is that accounted for by surplus or by outstanding securities?

Mr. DAVIS. It is accounted for by surplus.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Your concern has no outstanding bonds?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

So that it appears now that this company, with $20,000,000 of capital, has, out of its earnings, increased its value to $80,000,000.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. How do you explain the fact that you have no competition in this business, which appears to be profitable?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I have no explanation to offer, except the one which I have frequently offered, which is that we are making aluminum so good and so cheap that nobody else has ever gone into the business. There really is nothing to prevent anybody from going into the business.

Hurrying along, then comes in an investigation of where the company gets a lot of power for one of its plants, which it appears it obtains from Niagara Falls. I think that is immaterial here.

Mr. SABATH. What is the number of your stockholders?

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose 300.

Mr. SABATH. For the entire $80,000,000 of stock?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PORTER. Only $20,000,000 of stock.

Mr. DAVIS. The stock is closely held. The company is not a public company, listed on Wall Street, giving out its reports to the public, but it is the same as any other privately operated corporation, and it is for that reason I have suggested to the committee that they would, perhaps, excuse me from entering into details which after all do not affect the totals. I have given you a very accurate and clear conception of the totals. I think you will respect my position when you understand that acting on behalf of my associates I do not feel like giving up all of the inside facts to our foreign competitors. That is all it amounts to. If any of you gentlemen would like, I should be very glad to give you any facts and figures that you can ask for, but I prefer that they do not go into the record.

Mr. SABATH. Your stock is not quoted in Wall Street?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. SABATH. Is it quoted on the curb?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. SABATH. Has the stock been sold lately at all?

Mr. DAVIS. Only very minor sales among the inside people.

Mr. SABATH. Private sales?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PORTER. When was your company incorporated?

Mr. DAVIS. In 1888.

Mr. PORTER. With a capital stock of $20,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; our original capital stock was $1,000,000.

Mr. PORTER. When was it increased to $20,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. It was increased by successive changes to $20,000,000.

Mr. PORTER. When was the last increase?

Mr. DAVIS. The last increase was in 1909.

Mr. PORTER. You say that your plants are now worth $80,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PORTER. The difference between the original capital of $20,000,000 and $80,000,000 represents surplus that has been expended in betterments, I presume?

Mr. DAVIS. Substantially.

Mr. SABATH. Are you taking it for granted that the difference between $1,000,000 and $20,000,000 has been paid in?

Mr. PORTER. I am coming to that. Originally, you had $1,000,000 capital stock?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. PORTER. I assume that that was paid in in cash?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. I think there was some allowance for patents, but substantially it was paid in in cash.
Mr. PORTER. The next increase was what?
Mr. DAVIS. I believe the next increase was $600,000.
Mr. PORTER. Was that paid in in cash?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. PORTER. When was the next increase?
Mr. DAVIS. The next increase was several years after and consisted of an increase to $3,200,000.
Mr. PORTER. Did that represent cash?
Mr. DAVIS. One half cash and the other half was a stock dividend.

So it appears I was in error a while ago when I said $20,000,000 was being paid in. It had not been paid in. I read on:

Mr. PORTER. When was the next increase?
Mr. DAVIS. The next increase was in 1909.
Mr. PORTER. What did that represent?
Mr. DAVIS. A stock dividend.

So there was another stock dividend.

Mr. PORTER. What was the amount of that stock dividend?
Mr. DAVIS. Five hundred per cent.
Mr. PORTER. Could you estimate for me, in round figures, the actual amount of cash that has been invested in the $80,000,000 plants?
Mr. DAVIS. $80,000,000.
Mr. PORTER. I understood you to say that the properties were worth $80,000,000.
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. PORTER. With a capital stock of $20,000,000?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. PORTER. How much cash does the $20,000,000 of stock represent?
Mr. DAVIS. $80,000,000.

Observe the way this man answers questions which are perfectly plain.

Mr. PORTER. The actual cash paid in, not money from the profits?
Mr. DAVIS. I suppose $3,000,000, or thereabouts.

So I was entirely wrong when I said, to begin with, that they had $20,000,000 of stock that represented capital. I had read the first part of that testimony hurriedly and had not followed it through. It appears that this company, according to the testimony of Mr. Davis, had only put into it about $3,000,000; that it made $20,000,000 last year; that it had accumulated property worth $80,000,000; that it is now contracting with the Government of the United States at an advance over the prices that it was charging last year; and that the man who is making the contract, to all intents and purposes, on behalf of the Government, and at the same time on behalf of his company, is Mr. Davis, who sits with the Council of Defense as an adviser, making both sides of a contract.

I do not care how you sugar coat that proposition, I do not care what may be said with reference to the patriotism of men who are engaged in undertaking to serve the country at this time, I say it can not be disputed that if this gentleman is to deal with the Government in the matter of aluminum, taking a contract for a million canteens at one time at a price of $740,000 for that one contract, it is incumbent upon him to entirely and completely sever his connections with the Council of Defense when it comes to dealing with that sort of a matter. A man can not make both sides of a contract.

I do not say this in bitterness or in rancor, I do not say it for the purpose of uttering a single harsh statement regarding Mr. Davis, but it is absolutely impossible as a proposition of law and of good morals that it should be permitted that any man should represent his business in dealing with the United States Government and represent the Government at the same time.

Mr. President, we have entertained the utmost respect for our judiciary. The English-speaking people as a race have always revered as much as men ought to be revered the judges of our courts, and this is true because the judges of our courts have always walked the high path of rectitude in the blazing sunlight and have never done aught, speaking of them as a class, to lower the confidence of the people in their integrity. Yet, sir, we write it into our laws, and in some cases we write it into our Constitution, that no judge of a court shall sit in a cause where he has any interest whatsoever save that interest which must be common to the entire public. He can not decide a case where a close relative is a litigant; he can not sit in judgment in any matter where the judgment is to affect his own financial condition.

If we say thus of our courts, what shall we say when it comes to dealing with the Government at a time like this? Is it possible, is it tolerable, that men shall sit in council and determine, first, how many canteens the Government needs; second, shall that same man then help to determine how many shall be purchased; and then shall that same man, as the seller, fix the price and, as the buyer, accept the proposition?

Of course, it will be said he does not actually make the bargain. Of course, it will be said that some officer of the Government has to actually sign the bargain. Of course, it will be said that other members of the Council of Defense similarly situated with reference to other transactions have supervision of the bargain. But that does not do away with the fact that no man has any right in morals, any right in law, any right in the court of men or in the forum of conscience to act for himself and for the people at the same time.

We have gone so far in this body as to adopt an amendment to our rules in substance providing that no Senator shall vote upon a question where any business in which he is concerned is directly interested.

Mr. President, it is no answer to say, as was said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that this gentleman created the business of aluminum making. That is not the case. They may have done much to perfect it in this country, but they could not have done it all when 40 per cent was being sent to this country from Europe before the war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. The Senator from Mississippi stated that he had an editorial he wanted to read. I think I ought to allow that to go in, and I will yield then to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator from Missouri will indulge me, I desire to say that the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, in dealing with some of the extraordinary problems which have come to him in this emergency has manifested a disposition and exhibited qualities which command my very highest admiration. I am also especially pleased to find in the Washington Post of this morning an editorial which I am going, with the consent of the Senator from Missouri, to insert in the RECORD. It fits in with the tenor of the Senator's remarks and bolsters up the able arguments which the Senator has submitted, besides being the better expression of my own views on the subject under consideration. If I may further trespass upon the time of my generous friend, the Senator from Missouri, I want to say also that too often the metropolitan newspapers are inclined to condone any wrong or encourage and support any and everything which contributes to the interest of the rich few of this Republic, as against the interest of the masses. Coming upon this virile, patriotic editorial, sound in economics and perfect in morals, was like finding an oasis in the desert. I commend it to the Senate and to the American people and congratulate the Post. I shall read the editorial in full.

NO PROFITEERING!

Secretary Baker's letter to the director of the Council of National Defense, defining the limited powers of the council and its committees, and setting aside the attempt of a committee to fix the price of coal, comes at a very opportune time. The letter may do great good by stopping the development of a practice which could not end otherwise than in scandal to the administration and possible criminal prosecution of many prominent men.

The members of the council and its committees are able men, and no doubt most of them are individually patriotic. The system under which they are working, however, lends itself to favoritism, overcharge, and graft. Men who have not been conspicuous for patriotism or common honesty have wormed their way into the inner councils of some of these committees, and their successful attempts to throw contracts to themselves and their friends will cast discredit upon the whole organization.

It goes without saying that men interested in contracts can not give disinterested advice to the Government on such contracts; yet that is what has been attempted under the Council of National Defense. It is supposed that the advice is given for pure patriotism, while the contract is taken for pure business. The mixture of patriotism and profiteering is inherently bad. Either the men advising the Government must keep their hands off contracts, or their advice must be discarded as interested. Secretary Lane's inspiring appeal to the patriotism of business men is as true as it is eloquent, and they would do well to study it.

The business men of the United States can mend this dangerous mingling of patriotism and profiteering before it becomes worse. If they do not mend it, the Government and the people will mend it. It appears to a certain type of business man a fine thing to corkscrew extortionate prices out of the Government by pretending to give unselfish and patriotic advice. But it is not a shrewd thing to do. The men guilty of it will find their reputations gone, their families disgraced, and themselves lucky to escape jail if an outraged public, mourning the loss of American lads at the front, discovers that tricksters in Washington have made traffic of their blood.

There must be no profiteering. It is in the nature of treason.

Mr. President, I pause for a moment to say that if the dross of sin were extracted from the spirits of the lost since Adam's disobedience to the present time and put into the hands of Infinity, I do not believe a more consummate scoundrel could be fashioned into the form of man than the miserable creature who would take advantage of this emergency to rob and plunder the Government of the United States and betray the people in the name of patriotism. Such a monster would disgrace the penitentiary and dishonor the stripes of a felon. But I will continue:

The people will not tolerate it. It flourishes only where the people are kept in ignorance.

The tendency of the committees under the Council of National Defense to take the law into their own hands deserves the immediate and stern attention of the President. These committees have no executive powers, yet they are trying to dictate the placing of contracts, often to their own members, through the binding power of "advice." The result is confusion and an open avenue for the entrance of graft.

The Washington Post has often pointed out the inadequacy of the Council of National Defense. It now appears that the council and its committees must be called to account for illegal action. The system of contracts and purchases by committees is evidently unequal to the needs of the Government. If it is deemed unwise at this time to create a department of munitions, as other nations have done, it is at least time to put a curb upon the tendencies of certain committees to award contracts to their own members and to fix prices without warrant of law. It is better that the War and Navy Departments should struggle along without the advice of the Council of National Defense and its swarms of patriotic committees if this advice must be accompanied by favoritism, illegal price fixing, and attempts to throw contracts to men on the "inside," who pose as patriots, giving their services to the Nation free of charge.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if the Council of National Defense is a voluntary organization.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I rather think it is. Is it not? I will be glad to have the Senator from Oregon answer the question.

Mr. WATSON. I will say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. REED. I have yielded to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is my impression that it is a volunteer organization.

Mr. BORAH. That editorial would lead one to believe that it was a voluntary organization. My understanding is that these men have been called here from their several walks of life and appointed to this position.

Mr. VARDAMAN. To serve without pay.

Mr. BORAH. To serve without pay.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I mean pay from the Government direct.

Mr. BORAH. Of course I agree perfectly with the proposition which has been advanced by the Senator from Missouri, and which is advanced by the Senator from Mississippi, that the man who has the property to sell should not fix the price upon which he is going to sell it to the Government; that it is an impossible situation; but it is not fair to say that these men have volunteered or that they have wormed themselves into this service.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think the Senator will disagree to the proposition that it is improper for these men, if they are called, to accept the call to perform a sacred trust and then profit by it.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but it comes back to the proposition which was in my mind when I offered this amendment a few days ago. These men have the products which the Government must have in order to run this war. They have the several articles which it is necessary for the Government to buy. Now, how are you going to fix that price and pass upon the charges which they are permitted to make without scandal both to the Government and attack upon the men unless you have an impartial tribunal to fix the price of these articles?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think it is possible to do it. The Senator's ideas are correct.

Mr. BORAH. Of course it is not. Mr. President, the situation, which is an unfortunate one, and which, I agree with the Senator, is an intolerable one, arises out of the fact that these men have been called here for counsel and as advisers without having a tribunal, which is an impartial tribunal, to stand between them and the Government. Not only should you have a place for the protection of the men and the protection of the Government but for the protection of public opinion.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think the Senator is entirely right about that, but I want to say that human nature is so weak, however exalted the man's purpose may be, especially the man who gives his life to the accumulation of wealth, if the opportunity comes, his cupidity often unconsciously betrays him. In that I do not intend to be uncharitable. I am just discussing human nature. It is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Identically the same motives and influences have moved men from the days of Demosthenes and Socrates, Julius Cæsar and Cicero, that actuate men to-day. To borrow the language of Robert Burns to express my own thoughts:

I'll no say men are villains a';
The real, harden'd wicked,
Wha hae nae check but human law,
Are to a few restricted;
But, och! mankind are unco weak
An' little to be trusted;
If self the wavering balance shake,
It's rarely right adjusted.

Mr. BORAH. I also agree with Burns that it is impossible for a man who stands in that position to protect himself against the unconscious desire to accumulate wealth and to protect his interests, and to deal with the situation from a personal or selfish, you may say, standpoint. But there is another side to this proposition, and that is that these men are men of tremendous ability, of unquestioned genius in the line of industrial affairs; and if the Executive wants their advice and their counsel Congress should create a tribunal to pass upon the contract and to fix the prices and the charges which are to be paid by the Government.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Taking them out of temptation.

Mr. BORAH. It is not taking them out of temptation, because——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Keeping them out of temptation.

Mr. BORAH. There are no 10 men in the Senate, as exalted as we all are in our conception of duty and patriotism, who could fix a price upon anything which they had to sell, if any of them had anything to sell to the Government of the United States without being criticized, and in just the same way and without the public looking upon it as intolerable, as the Senator from Missouri has very well said. There is an easy solution, and it is to create a tribunal which is to fix these prices and charges and take advantage of the advice and counsel of these men. I am opposed to the present condition of affairs, but it can only be remedied by some impartial tribunal to pass on all these matters.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to be led aside from my theme, but I suggest to the Senator from Idaho—and my idea is not in conflict with his at all—let us assume that during this war it should transpire that some Senator had something that the Government needed, and that the Government needed his services in producing that thing; the proper thing to do in a case of that kind would be for the Government, through an independent agency which was appointed to represent the Government, to come to that Senator and have that Senator name his price, and if necessary ask him to furnish his entire balance sheet, an itemized statement of his business, so that they could tell that he was giving them the thing at a fair price, but not to try and fix it.

Now, in order to clear up the relations of Mr. Davis to these transactions, let me take your time to read this testimony, because I think around the Davis case we may group many other cases. Here is his testimony.

First, let me bring you up to that because I was talking about the investment of this company and I do not want to break that theme. I will get to the one we are just now discussing in a moment. The committee referred again to the question of capital. Mr. Porter said:

Mr. PORTER. The actual cash paid in, not money from the profits?
Mr. DAVIS. I suppose $3,000,000, or thereabouts.
Mr. PORTER. What dividend did you pay last year?
Mr. DAVIS. Ten per cent on $20,000,000.
Mr. PORTER. And the year preceding?
Mr. DAVIS. Ten per cent, I think it was.
Mr. PORTER. Last year how much of your profits did you apply to betterments, in addition to paying the 10 per cent dividends?
Mr. DAVIS. Practically all of the balance. We have always paid very small dividends, but I can not remember offhand the exact figures; but for the first 8 or 10 years of our existence we did not pay any dividends at all.

And so forth.

Then Mr. Porter asked a long question. He concluded by saying:

In other words, how much did you make last year?
Mr. DAVIS. We made a little over $20,000,000.
Mr. PORTER. Last year?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. PORTER. You made about 100 per cent on the capital stock?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; and about 25 per cent on the investment.
Mr. PORTER. You declared a dividend of 10 per cent?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. PORTER. And 90 per cent, or the balance, went into the betterment of your plant?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Then comes the question of the plant in Canada, which I pass over as not sufficiently material to take time to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke of $3,000,000; where did you get the $3,000,000?

Now, that is the capital again.

Mr. DAVIS. At various stages.
The CHAIRMAN. First, the company was capitalized at $1,000,000?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Was that all money?
Mr. DAVIS. I think there was some allowance for patents.
The CHAIRMAN. How did Mr. Hall come in?
Mr. DAVIS. He came in on that.
The CHAIRMAN. Did he put up money or his patents?
Mr. DAVIS. His patents.
The CHAIRMAN. What proportion of the million dollars did his patents represent?
Mr. DAVIS. In the beginning they represented about 40 per cent, but there were so many changes that the patent situation afterwards became very much less than 40 per cent.
The CHAIRMAN. And the other $600,000 was in money?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. At first?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. The next increase was $600,000?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Was there any money put in?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That makes $1,200,000?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. The next increase was to $3,200,000?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Half of that was outside cash?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. That made $2,000,000. That is all the cash that was ever put in this company? The rest represents profits——
Mr. DAVIS. That was 30 years ago—I can not bring it all back—but my recollection is that more than $600,000 was put in at the beginning, but with the proper correction made for that your figures would be correct.

So we get down practically to the figures of $2,000,000 in a concern now worth $80,000,000, that made last year $20,000,000.

Then there is some talk about how Mr. Hall died. With reference to the importance of this article, let me take that up first and let me answer that question out of Mr. Davis's own testimony:

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. We have been told that this legislation is necessary because aluminum is used for war munitions or war material. I would like you to tell us in just what way aluminum goes into munitions or materials in connection with the war, so that we will have that in the record?
Mr. DAVIS. Aluminum is used in a great many ways in connection with war supplies. The direct use of aluminum is in the form of ground or powdered aluminum, which is mixed with the explosive to accentuate the explosive power.

Now, that is certainly important.

Aside from this use, the places in which aluminum is used are a thousand and one places where a metal of its light weight and noncorroding qualities is desired. For instance, in the engines of airplanes, in Zeppelins, in various parts of trucks, in bake ovens, water-sterilizing apparatus, in canteens, meat cans, ticket pins, tent pins, etc. Aluminum is also an essential feature in the manufacture of steel. Although only a small percentage of aluminum is put in steel, in the aggregate a very large tonnage is used in steel, and in so far as such steel is used for governmental purposes the aluminum indirectly is used for governmental purposes.
Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Do you know how much is being sold to the steel companies now of your production?
Mr. DAVIS. I can not answer that question in percentages, but I suppose one-sixth or one-seventh of the total product, as a rough guess.
Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Are you selling any aluminum to the Government outside of the aluminum used in the canteens?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; we are selling to the various arsenals, navy yards, and other bureaus.
The CHAIRMAN. Please state how much you sell to the Government.
Mr. DAVIS. Up to the present time, since the beginning of the war, the amount of aluminum which has been used has not been large. We estimate the present requirements of the Government are about 8,000,000 pounds—

That is not large, I suppose, in comparison with this great business—but presumptively, when they begin to go into the Zeppelin, airplane, and motor-truck business the requirements will be substantially larger.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any relation with the Government?

I wish the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] could be here, because this is in answer to his question.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any relation with the Government? Do you occupy any position with the Government?
Mr. DAVIS. No, sir. I am chairman of the subcommittee of the National Council of Defense, if that can be considered a Government position.
The CHAIRMAN. By whom were you appointed?
Mr. DAVIS. By Mr. Baruch.
The CHAIRMAN. Of the Council of National Defense?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Do you know how much electric power you are getting as a result of the temporary permits granted last year by Congress?

That is the power they got from Niagara.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it is about 10,000 horsepower. It is a little difficult to say how much we get as a result of this permit as compared with what we would get anyway without the permit; but, perhaps, 10,000 horsepower will be a fair estimate.
Mr. HUDDLESTON. What are the duties of the chairman of this subcommittee? What is the chairman of this subcommittee supposed to do?
Mr. DAVIS. The chairmen of all of these subcommittees are supposed to look after the requirements of the Government in their particular line.

I desire to read that sentence again.

The chairmen of all these subcommittees are supposed to look after the requirements of the Government in their particular line.

Whether they hold official position or not; whether they have ever been required to take and subscribe an oath as officials, they are a sort of de facto officers, they do assume a trust relation, for whenever a man undertakes to perform a function for the Government and the Government turns the performance of the function over to him, he becomes a trustee for the Government to the extent of the powers which he assumes to employ. So, says this gentleman—and I again repeat that sentence:

The chairmen of all these subcommittees are supposed to look after the requirements of the Government in their particular line.

He continues:

We, of course, have no authority to buy or close any contracts. All of the contracts are not submitted to us for our comment or approval.
Mr. HUDDLESTON. You act in an advisory capacity?
Mr. DAVIS. We act simply in an advisory capacity. In so far as my committee has acted so far, certain requirements of the Government have been turned over to us for our approval after all of the bids have been taken, and our opinion has been asked as to whether the price is a fair one, and whether we considered the parties reliable, the specifications correct, etc.

Now, I invite the attention of Senators who are in the Chamber to that spectacle.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?
Mr. REED. Yes.
Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] asked whether or not the Council of National Defense was a voluntary body, and I intended to answer him then; but the Senator from Missouri resumed his discussion of the subject.

I desire to call the Senate's attention to the fact that the Council of National Defense was created by the act of June 30, 1916. I refer to the Army appropriations act of that year. If the Senator from Missouri will read section 2 of that law, he will find there prescribed the duties of the respective bodies; that is, of the members of the Council of National Defense and the advisory committees, which have been appointed in pursuance of the act.

Mr. REED. I am aware of the fact that the reference is in that act, and I shall read it in a moment, but I now call the attention of the Senate to the spectacle presented.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to state, in connection with the remark made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], that I thought the Senator from Idaho meant to ask whether the advisory commission was a volunteer body, and not whether the Council of National Defense was a volunteer body. I think he misspoke himself; but I, of course, could not speak for him.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say to the Senator that under the act creating the Council of National Defense, which is an official body, it has power to appoint these advisory commissions, and pursuant to that authority it has appointed these special advisory commissions—quite a large body of men in different walks of life.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the Senator from Idaho said that they were a volunteer body, or had been requested to come here, I think he made the distinction plain. These advisory commissions did not rush into this position to accomplish some purpose of their own; but, as I understand, they were requested to come here to help.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They were invited to assist the commission?
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad in a moment to put in the statement of the law itself, since the Senator in charge of the bill has called attention to it; but just now I want to get the attention of Senators to the spectacle that is presented by Mr. Davis's own testimony. Let me read again. He is answering the question—

What are the duties of the chairman of this subcommittee? What is the chairman of this subcommittee supposed to do?

He answers:

The chairmen of all of these subcommittees are supposed to look after the requirements of the Government in their particular line.

That is, the chairmen of these subcommittees are supposed to look after the requirements of the Government in that particular line of business which the chairman of the subcommittee is engaged in, I assume. But I have passed that. You may give it that construction or not, as you see fit. Mr. Davis continues:

We, of course, have no authority to buy or close any contracts. All of the contracts are not submitted to us for our comment or approval.
Mr. HUDDLESTON. You act in an advisory capacity?

Now, notice:

Mr. DAVIS. We act simply in an advisory capacity. In so far as my committee has acted so far—certain requirements of the Government have been turned over to us for our approval.

That would be the requirements of the Government for aluminum. The Government brings in its requirements for aluminum and says to these gentlemen, "We need so much aluminum." Says this gentleman:

Certain requirements of the Government have been turned over to us for our approval after all of the bids have been taken.

The Government requires, we will say, a million canteens. It takes all the bids, or it needs a certain amount of aluminum, and it takes all bids for aluminum. Then those bids for aluminum are turned over for the opinion of this committee, of which the president of the Aluminum Co. is the head. Whose bids are they, pray? As he makes all the aluminum that is employed in the United States, they are, of course, his bids. So you have a spectacle of a corporation bidding for a certain amount of aluminum to be furnished the Government, and you have that bid then turned over to the president of that corporation for his examination and approval as a representative of the Government.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I request that the Senator from Missouri will read now, in connection with his remarks, the third paragraph of the act in question, because they have not the power to do what the gentleman says they have the power to do? I think it is fair to have the law itself defining their powers now submitted in connection with the statement.

Mr. REED. I will read the law, but I want to read the rest of this answer from a man who is putting the law into effect. I will read it again, so that we shall get it altogether:

> We act simply in an advisory capacity. In so far as my committee has acted so far, certain requirements of the Government have been turned over to us for our approval after all of the bids have been taken, and our opinion has been asked as to whether the price is a fair one—

Having made the price to the Government, they are asked, as the representatives of the Government, if the price is a fair one—> and whether we considered the parties reliable—

They are solemnly asked whether they think they themselves are reliable!

> and whether the specifications are correct—

And so forth.

It has been a good while since I attended a performance of the Mikado, but there was a gentleman in that play whose name, as I recall, was Pooh-Bah, who occupied several exalted positions under the Government. In one of these positions he dealt with himself in the other position. In one or two instances it became his pathetic duty to offer himself a bribe in one capacity and to accept a bribe in another capacity. It is so long since I witnessed that interesting performance upon the stage that the details have left me, but the future historian might well——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. If I may offer a little aid to the able Senator, the character to whom the Senator has reference, I think, posed as the lord high executioner. He was offered a bribe not to execute, and as lord high executioner he felt it his duty to accept the bribe, in order to allow the convict whom he had already convicted to escape.

Mr. REED. He was also the judge.

Mr. LEWIS. He was also the judge who had condemned him.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. The details come back to me. As I was about to say, the historian of the future, if he can find anything of humor in the ghastly situation that now confronts the world, might present on some comic-opera stage the picture of Barney Baruch selecting the president of the aluminum company to pass upon aluminum contracts, and of the president of the aluminum company solemnly making his offers to the Government, and of Barney Baruch, with equal solemnity, turning them over for examination to the president of the aluminum company, and of the president of the aluminum company, with equal solemnity and dignity, certifying that the price is fair and that the parties contracting are reliable!

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri whether there is anything in the RECORD from which he has read to indicate that the corporation of which Mr. Davis is the head directly contracted with the Government? Is not that corporation a wholesale producer of aluminum, and are not many things for which the Government contracts produced by people who simply buy the aluminum from the wholesale producer? Does not Mr. Davis refer to contracts made with such persons, and not to contracts made with his own corporation?

In that connection, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that my disposition is always, in matters of this kind, in dealing with public officials or men who are acting in a quasi-public capacity, to assume that they are honest; that they are innocent, rather than that they are guilty; and to view a transaction as innocent, if it will bear that interpretation, rather than assume that it is a criminal one. As I understand, the great purpose of the National Government and the great purpose of Congress in passing the law creating the Council of National Defense was, first, to bring members of the Cabinet themselves——

Mr. REED. Is the Senator desiring to make an address or is he desiring to ask me a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I propose to proceed about two or three sentences further in order to elucidate what I have said.

Mr. REED. That will be agreeable to me. I merely wanted to know whether the Senator was going to make it short.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not intend to make a speech.

I understand the purpose of the Government and of Congress itself in creating the Council of National Defense was, first, to bring the members of the Cabinet, who had to deal with the various activities of war, into some coordinated effort; second, to give them the advantage of the information—mainly the information, I should say—of the chiefs of the great industries of the country, upon which the Government would be compelled to draw in order efficiently to carry on the war. Now, I can not imagine how one can get information from the men having the most information unless he consults the chiefs of these various industries; and if they are the chiefs of the various industries, they must be interested in production in some way. I do not understand, however, that any power is given either to the Council of National Defense or to the advisory commission to bind the Government. They can not make contracts; they can get information and get advice, but they can not make contracts. Of course, we can go on; we can assume, on the one hand, that the Council of National Defense, acting patriotically, have called the chiefs of these great industries, who are also disposed to act patriotically, in council with them in order to obtain information and advice; and we can also assume, if we choose, that both the Council of National Defense and the advisory commission and the subcommittees are all of them dealing corruptly with this great subject. So far as I am concerned, unless I have direct proof to the contrary, I am going to assume that these agencies created by Congress for the purpose of getting information needed by the Government—and it is the Executive department, the President, who alone can act—I am going to assume that they are acting honestly and patriotically, and not dishonestly and disloyally.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I had not charged anybody with robbing the Government. If the Senator had been in the room during the course of my remarks, he would not have had any occasion to climb the tribune of virtue, which he so often occupies in this Chamber, and tell us how fair he is, and, by innuendo, to convey the impression that I have been unfair. I have been reading this gentleman's testimony, and have been reading it without further comment than to say that it was impossible for conditions of that kind to be allowed to continue.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, might I ask the Senator, if I may be pardoned——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the record show that a contract has actually been made between the Government and this gentleman for his company; or does the Senator content himself with calling attention to the fact that he hopes to have the contract, and has made the articles with that view?

Mr. REED. I am trying to get before the Senate the peculiar situation that seems to exist. I had not finished reading the testimony, which would have thrown a little light upon it; but as I understand the matter, when the Government desires a certain thing, to wit, aluminum, it makes that fact known, and, according to the testimony of Mr. Davis, the bids for aluminum are then referred to the subcommittee of which he is chairman, and the committee then advises whether or not the bids ought to be accepted.

Mr. LEWIS. Then the Senator's position is, if I understand him, that that record leaves the matter where he probably bids, and through a committee of which he himself is the chairman he passes upon his own bid.

Mr. REED. It amounts practically to that. He submits bids to the Government, or to the National Council of Defense, and the bids are referred back to him or to his subcommittee.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the record disclose, may I ask the Senator, that such conditions have really transpired?

Mr. REED. I have been reading the testimony. How far they have gone in actually closing contracts seems to be in doubt. This gentleman states one instance where he has accepted an order for manufacturing aluminum; but whether he has actually been delivering it on a signed contract I do not know. Let me read on with this testimony. We will get a little light from it. I should like to have the Senator from Illinois wait a moment to listen to it:

> Mr. HUDDLESTON. Who are your associates on the committee?
> Mr. DAVIS. Mr. E. E. Allyne, president of a large aluminum foundry, and Mr. Janney, of Philadelphia, who is a metal broker.
> Mr. HUDDLESTON. Have they Government contracts also?
> Mr. DAVIS. No; I think not.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. They are in the business to ask for them?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Janney would not be. I suppose Mr. Allyne's company would take a contract if one came along for crude castings, but up to the present time nothing of that kind has come up, and I do not know that it will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This committee is the one you referred to when you stated that the price you had made was approved by the authorities?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; it was approved by the Council of National Defense or by the munitions board. I will have to admit my ignorance of the exact line of cleavage.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. You can pardon us all for having some ignorance on that point. What we want to do is to secure some information.

Mr. DAVIS. After the prices were approved by the Ordnance Bureau they were approved by the munitions board. I remember that the approval was signed by Mr. Scott and Mr. Plant. I do not know just who Mr. Plant is. I know Mr. Scott.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Who is Mr. Scott?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Scott is a Cleveland gentleman who, as I understand, is chairman of the munitions board.

Mr. PORTER. You are chairman of the aluminum committee?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PORTER. And you have two associates?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PORTER. In case the Government wanted to buy aluminum that would be assigned to your committee?

Mr. DAVIS. That has not been the way in which it has been done.

Mr. PORTER. If bids were submitted to furnish aluminum, your committee would primarily pass on the bids?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. PORTER. What function do you perform?

Mr. DAVIS. It varies.

Mr. PORTER. That is what I am trying to ascertain.

Mr. DAVIS. It is purely advisory.

Mr. PORTER. Suppose you, representing one company, and your associates each representing a company and three bids should come in, one from each company, how would the committee determine that?

Mr. DAVIS. Our committee has no authority over the bids. The procedure, so far as our committee has been concerned—and I know nothing about any other committees—has been substantially as follows—

Now, follow this and see whether this gentleman is not passing on his own product—

For instance, the Quartermaster's Department has been in the market for 4,000,000 aluminum tent pins. They have obtained prices from, perhaps, 15 or 20 different companies. My own company did not bid. We were not asked to bid. In fact, it is a little out of our line, and I do not suppose that we would have bid on them. These bids have all been taken by the Quartermaster's Department in exactly the same manner as they would have been before the war. We were not consulted in the matter in any way, shape, or form. I mean our subcommittee was not consulted. The Quartermaster's Department now proposes to let this contract presumptively to the lowest bidder. I understand that yesterday a letter was sent from the Quartermaster's Department to the Council of National Defense stating that they proposed to let a contract for 4,000,000 tent pins at such and such a price, and asking the opinion of the Council of National Defense as to the price, specifications, etc. This letter will be turned over to our committee, presumptively, and the members of the committee who know something about the aluminum business will figure it through and ascertain if, in our opinion, the price is a fair one.

Mr. PORTER. Your company will not be one of the bidders?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. You make the aluminum?

Mr. DAVIS. We do not know whether we would or not. We have nothing to do with the concerns. I do not even know who is bidding on the aluminum.

And yet his former testimony had been explicit that there was not any aluminum in this country except that which he furnished, and it is here in the record half a dozen times:

Mr. PORTER. You furnish the aluminum to the company that makes the pins?

Mr. DAVIS. We very likely will. I do not know who they are or with whom they have their aluminum contracts.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Is not your concern the only one in this country?

Mr. DAVIS. At the present time; yes, sir. There is a very large amount of aluminum on the market which is resold aluminum, and a great deal of the present supply of aluminum comes from scrap, junk, and various other forms of old aluminum.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. With reference to the contemplated order for canteens, your concern would be the only one that would be able to furnish canteens in that number?

Mr. DAVIS. I think we would be the only concern that is big enough to get a million canteens out in the very short time that is required.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. So that your concern would supply them?

Mr. DAVIS. Not necessarily.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. You would know, as a member of the subcommittee, that the committee was considering an order for 1,000,000 canteens?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; I would not.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Aluminum canteens——

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir. For instance, I knew nothing about the tent-pin order until it was all through.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. But in the final analysis you would, would you not?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; if it were sent to the Council of National Defense.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Do you furnish jobbers with aluminum utensils of any kind that are used by jobbers throughout the country?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Coffee kettles, and the like?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Can you recall now what you get for coffee kettles?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; not for cooking utensils, because——

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH (interposing). Can you say what price you get for any utensils?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. For utensils of the size and capacity of the Army canteen?

Mr. DAVIS. We get more; I have no hesitancy in saying that we would get more.

Mr. GOODWIN. How many aluminum companies are there in America of any substantial size or importance?

Mr. DAVIS. Do you mean manufacturing companies?

Mr. GOODWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Do you mean companies smelting aluminum from the ore or manufacturers of canteens?

Mr. GOODWIN. Either or both.

Mr. DAVIS. We are the only company that smelts it, or produces it from the ore, but there is a large number of companies who buy aluminum and make utensils out of it. As a matter of fact, any company which has the facilities for utilizing brass or copper is in as good a position to utilize aluminum.

Mr. GOODWIN. What percentage of the world's output of aluminum is produced in this country?

Mr. DAVIS. About one-half of it, I think, is made here.

Mr. GOODWIN. About one-half of it is found in America, or most of it——

Mr. DAVIS (interposing). Do you mean what percentage of the total ore of the world exists in the United States?

Mr. GOODWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. That would be a very difficult question to answer. Bauxite exists in great quantities in a great many places, and it has never been really measured up or calculated.

Mr. GOODWIN. What increase in the price of aluminum has taken place since the beginning of the European war?

Mr. DAVIS. I think, perhaps, that you were not here——

Mr. GOODWIN (interposing). No; I came in just a few minutes ago.

Mr. DAVIS. I said awhile ago that our average price for the 10 years preceding the war was 25½ cents per pound, and that our price for 1916 was 30 cents per pound, or a little less than 30 cents per pound.

Now, that is the price, 25½ cents, on which they made, from $2,000,000, $80,000,000 of capital, besides declaring some dividends.

Mr. GOODWIN. What is your present price?

Mr. DAVIS. Our average price in April, 1917, was 35 cents per pound.

That is an increase of about 40 per cent, as I carry it in my mind.

Mr. GOODWIN. You spoke awhile ago of the increased value of your plant being due to betterments, the betterments consisting of the application of the undivided profits to the company. Do I understand that to be the case?

Mr. DAVIS. Exactly.

Mr. GOODWIN. What has been the total amount of the undivided profits from the beginning of your company, or during the entire existence of your company, up to the present time—that is, the total amount of the undivided profits or dividends that went into betterments?

Mr. DAVIS. Perhaps $70,000,000.

Mr. GOODWIN. Is the $80,000,000 you mentioned in effect the valuation placed on your plant, or the real genuine valuation of it, and is that reached by taking the moneys paid in from time to time by way of capital, plus the undivided profits going into the company in the way of betterments?

Mr. DAVIS. It represents actual cash disbursements.

I have been over that valuation question. Now I want to proceed to another matter.

Mr. PORTER. You have what you call manufacturing companies?

Mr. DAVIS. We have the United States Aluminum Co.

Mr. PORTER. And it has plants at various places over the country?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PORTER. Will none of those companies bid on these contracts?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; none of them.

Mr. PORTER. Suppose you should reach the point, and it is very likely that you will, when a bid will come in from one of your subsidiary companies. What about the propriety of your passing on the bid of your own company?

Mr. DAVIS. If I passed upon it as fairly as I did upon this canteen job, in which I put in the aluminum at 27½ cents per pound, which is substantially under the market, and then added thereto a less amount for fabricating than I would have added in selling it to anybody else, I do not think there could be any very great impropriety in my stating that the sale to the Government at a less price than we would have sold it to anybody else and at a less price than the Government could get from anybody else would be fair and proper.

Now, it is perfectly plain from those answers that they have contracted and contemplate contracting; but, as I stated early in my remarks, before the Senator came in who accuses me of being unfair with these gentlemen, by implication, at least, these men claim that they have been perfectly fair in their dealings with the Government. What I say is that it is an impossible situation, an impossible arrangement, an arrangement that is bound to end disastrously for all concerned.

I read on:

Mr. PORTER. In fixing that price of 27½ cents to the Government, did you take into consideration the fact that you made this year a profit of 100 per cent——

Mr. DAVIS (interposing). That price of 27½ cents per pound was made up, as I have just explained, by taking a 10 years' average price and adding thereto 2 cents per pound.

Mr. PORTER. Have you any objection to furnishing the committee with these data:—The amount of original capital stock from the date of incorporation; the date and amount of each increase; the actual amount of cash paid in originally, together with the actual amount of cash paid in at all of the subsequent increases; and the dividends declared by your company, if any, for each year since its incorporation? Have you any objection to furnishing that information?

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection whatever, except that I must say that, as to the amount of money originally invested, the records covering the original $1,000,000 company are not available.

I have run over that hastily.

Mr. SABATH. You do not produce all of the aluminum in the United States, do you?

Mr. DAVIS. We produce all of the new aluminum that is smelted.

Mr. SABATH. But there is a large quantity of aluminum that is being rerefined or resmelted every day?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. There are a great many large refining and smelting establishments in the United States?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

I put that in because I think, in fairness, I ought to put it in. Now, here is a question to which I want to call attention:

Mr. PORTER. Would it not be embarrassing to you if a bid from one of your companies, or one of your subsidiary companies, came in, for you to report that it was not one that should be accepted? Would it not be embarrassing for you, if a bid came in from your company or from one of your subsidiary companies, to say to the Council of National Defense that you did not think the bid ought to be accepted?

Mr. DAVIS. If it were conceivable that our company would quote a price to our Government which was not fair, it would be embarrassing for me to have to admit it.

Mr. PORTER. You never would admit it, would you?

Mr. DAVIS. I would never make such a price.

Mr. President, I have run rather hastily through that testimony. I promised the manager for the committee, the distinguished Senator from Oregon, to put in the act under which the Council of National Defense was created.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the only parts of it which define the power of the Council of National Defense and the subcommittees are, I think, the third and fourth paragraphs of the act.

Mr. REED. I ask permission to put in, without reading, all of section 2 of the act in order that it may go in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SEC. 2. That a Council of National Defense is hereby established for the coordination of industries and resources for the national security and welfare, to consist of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor.

That the Council of National Defense shall nominate to the President, and the President shall appoint, an advisory commission, consisting of not more than seven persons, each of whom shall have special knowledge of some industry, public utility, or the development of some natural resource, or be otherwise specially qualified, in the opinion of the council, for the performance of the duties hereinafter provided. The members of the advisory commission shall serve without compensation, but shall be allowed actual expenses of travel and subsistence when attending meetings of the commission or engaged in investigations pertaining to its activities. The advisory commission shall hold such meetings as shall be called by the council or be provided by the rules and regulations adopted by the council for the conduct of its work.

That it shall be the duty of the Council of National Defense to supervise and direct investigations and make recommendations to the President and the heads of executive departments as to the location of railroads with reference to the frontier of the United States so as to render possible expeditious concentration of troops and supplies to points of defense; the coordination of military, industrial, and commercial purposes in the location of extensive highways and branch lines of railroad; the utilization of waterways; the mobilization of military and naval resources for defense; the increase of domestic production of articles and materials essential to the support of armies and of the people during the interruption of foreign commerce; the development of seagoing transportation; data as to amounts, location, method and means of production and availability of military supplies; the giving of information to producers and manufacturers as to the class of supplies needed by the military and other services of the Government, the requirements relating thereto, and the creation of relations which will render possible in time of need the immediate concentration and utilization of the resources of the Nation.

That the Council of National Defense shall adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of its work, which rules and regulations shall be subject to the approval of the President, and shall provide for the work of the advisory commission to the end that the special knowledge of such commission may be developed by suitable investigation, research, and inquiry and made available in conference and report for the use of the council; and the council may organize subordinate bodies for its assistance in special investigations, either by the employment of experts or by the creation of committees of specially qualified persons to serve without compensation, but to direct the investigations of experts so employed.

That the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available for experimental work and investigations undertaken by the council, by the advisory commission, or subordinate bodies, for the employment of a director, expert and clerical expenses and supplies, and for the necessary expenses of members of the advisory commission or subordinate bodies going to and attending meetings of the commission or subordinate bodies. Reports shall be submitted by all subordinate bodies and by the advisory commission to the council, and from time to time the council shall report to the President or to the heads of executive departments upon special inquiries or subjects appropriate thereto, and an annual report to the Congress shall be submitted through the President, including as full a statement of the activities of the council and the agencies subordinate to it as is consistent with the public interest, including an itemized account of the expenditures made by the council or authorized by it, in as full detail as the public interest will permit: Provided, however, That when deemed proper the President may authorize, in amounts stipulated by him, unvouchered expenditures and report the gross sums so authorized not itemized.

Mr. REED. In order that the Senate may hear the particular part the Senate is interested in, I read:

That the Council of National Defense shall nominate to the President, and the President shall appoint, an advisory commission, consisting of not more than seven persons, each of whom shall have special knowledge of some industry, public utility, or the development of some natural resource, or be otherwise specially qualified, in the opinion of the council, for the performance of the duties hereinafter provided. The members of the advisory commission shall serve without compensation, but shall be allowed actual expenses of travel and subsistence when attending meetings of the commission or engaged in investigations pertaining to its activities. The advisory commission shall hold such meetings as shall be called by the council or be provided by the rules and regulations adopted by the council for the conduct of its work.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The next paragraph, I will say to the Senator, defines their powers.

Mr. REED. Well, I will read it:

That it shall be the duty of the Council of National Defense to supervise and direct investigations and make recommendations to the President and the heads of executive departments as to the location of railroads with reference to the frontier of the United States so as to render possible expeditious concentration of troops and supplies to points of defense; the coordination of military, industrial, and commercial purposes in the location of extensive highways and branch lines of railroad; the utilization of waterways; the mobilization of military and naval resources for defense; the increase of domestic production of articles and materials essential to the support of armies and of the people during the interruption of foreign commerce; the development of seagoing transportation; data as to amounts, location, method and means of production, and availability of military supplies; the giving of information to producers and manufacturers as to the class of supplies needed by the military and other services of the Government, the requirements relating thereto, and the creation of relations which will render possible in time of need the immediate concentration and utilization of the resources of the Nation.

Is there more than the Senator desires read?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. REED. But I find nothing in there to authorize these gentlemen to pass on contracts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, Mr. President, that is the proposition I desired to state—that if they were doing that they were exceeding any power that was given them by this act.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And it is something that the members of the council, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor can stop; and I understood from a paper that was read by the Senator this morning that the Secretary of War had practically stopped their effort to fix prices.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether the term "pass on contracts" necessarily implies that they have binding authority, or that they act in any binding capacity? I assume that the Council of National Defense, as advisors to the President under this act, call upon the representatives of the various industries for their opinions as to the advisability of certain contracts, and possibly as to the reasonableness of the price, and so forth; but that does not indicate that these people have any power to pass on the price or to pass on the contract in any binding way.

Mr. REED. What is the use of quibbling, Mr. President? Nobody is going to be fooled by any kind of quibbling. I have not charged that anyone has robbed the Government. I am calling attention to the necessity of including aluminum as one of the articles the price of which is to be controlled. That led into the reading of this testimony, and the reading of this testimony discloses the fact that there is a subcommittee on aluminum products, that the chairman of that subcommittee is the president of the aluminum companies that control the entire product in the United States, and they control all of the product that can now be obtained in the United States, for the foreign supply is cut off. That gentleman states that these contracts are referred to him for his recommendation, and that it is the business of the committee to supervise the contract, to see whether it is fair in its price, whether its terms are proper, and to make their recommendations.

Now, it may be that technically they have no authority to bind the United States, but practically their word must go a long way, or they would not be put in this position, and they would not be trifling away their time in the performance of an idle ceremony. So why stand and quibble about it? The power, if exercised, is just as great whether it be done by potential advice that is taken by the man who wields the pen, or whether the pen is actually wielded by the man who gives the advice. What difference is there?

Mr. President, something has been said here about the coal situation. The chairman of the committee in charge of the bill has raised that issue. That is an interesting thing. I stated to the Senate the other day that if we would let the business of the country go along, only undertaking to put our hand upon those men who did unjust things, who forestalled the market, who limited production, who gathered the goods of the country and held them so as to push prices up, we would be better off, and if we undertook to interfere we would muss things up—not a very elegant phrase, but I have already submitted to the Senate some examples of the mussing that has already been done. Now, where is there a better illustration of the mussing of things than is to be found in this aluminum situation, to which I have called attention, unless it be in the coal controversy?

I read in the New York Times of Wednesday, June 27, which happens to be handed to me, this statement. I read the headlines:

Coal producers promise to sell at fair prices—Pledge given at conference with Defense Council committee, 400 attending—Alternative to seizure—Government ready to take over output, officials warn—Will supervise prices—To hold wheat and coal—Export of these staples to be restricted first.

I read part of the statement of Secretary Lane:

The success of the country in this great war rests on you, and you are responsible, just the same as the soldiers in the trenches, Pershing in France, or the President in the White House. You control the fundamental industry. How much vision have you? Are you small or big? Are you petty politicians or statesmen? The country will not stand anything but a large policy from large men—

And so forth. Other men made speeches, and so they proceeded. The next day at least one of the papers made the statement that Secretary Lane had complimented these coal men upon their patriotism and congratulated them upon coming to the rescue of the country. I thought I had that newspaper with me, but I find I have not it at this moment.

Mr. President, I do not intend to put in this article, but just enough to call attention to it. I call attention to the headlines in the Washington Post of July 1:

Coal price is cause of split in Cabinet—Baker attacks $3 a ton fixed by Lane and council—Daniels is not to pay it—Navy will continue to buy at $2.33, he announces—Calls agreement illegal—Secretary of War, in letter, writes that Defense Council committee, Secretary Lane, and Trade Commission had no right at meeting with operators to arrange maximum or any other price—Declares figure is exorbitant and unjust—Asserts council is only advisory.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that is just the proposition that I suggested to the Senator a while ago—that in the multitude of men who are called upon in an advisory capacity there may be some so far forgetful of their duties as to act as purchasing agents as well as in an advisory capacity; but, in the last analysis, the men at the head of that commission will call down those who are undertaking to mulct the Government, just as the Secretary of War has done, telling them that their duty is simply advisory and that they can not take contracts or purchase for the Government from themselves.

Mr. REED. I hope for all those good things; and yet it seems, according to the accounts as I get them from the press, that the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War are challenging the action of the Secretary of the Interior in fixing a price.

Let me say this, now, lest I forget it later on, and let me say it with all the emphasis of which I am capable: As long as the situation is presented of the great manufacturers of the country sitting in the councils of the Nation and making prices, we may be very sure that those great manufacturers will not give themselves any the worst of the bargain; and the coal contract or settlement or adjustment of the last few days is a good example of it. Mr. President, there is no one there who can speak for the general public in the same sense that the coal operator who is called in may speak for his business, in the same sense that the proprietor of the aluminum products of this country can speak for his business, in the same sense that the proprietor of a great steel mill can speak for his business.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. No one is there, when it comes to the question of fixing the prices of grain, to speak for the grain producers of this country as a proprietor; and let me point you the difference. The man who runs the aluminum business of this country, sitting there, deals as a proprietor; but who is there that is the proprietor of the grain fields of the United States to sit and speak as a proprietor upon that board? Who is there who can speak for the consumer in the same way?

Mr. President—I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota in one moment—I do not want to be captious or critical at a time like this. I appreciate the efforts that are being made by Cabinet officers, as members of the Council of National Defense, to accomplish things as quickly as they can. I am willing that some irregularity, even, shall be admitted; but I say that when the Government of the United States is assuming the authority and the power and the right to commandeer the products of the millions of fields of this land, the products of the millions of farms of this country, to fix prices by denying open markets; when the powerful arms of this Government can be stretched across the continent and embrace all that the farmer produces and control his market and thus control his price; when that is the case with the farmers, there ought to be power enough in this Government to say to the railroad companies, "You must transport the coal from the mines to the people," and there ought to be power enough in this Government to say to the owners of these mines:

"It is costing you but little more for your coal than it cost last year, and you must deliver it at the mouth of the mine at a fair price, or we will control it for you; and we will not sit down here and agree to give you an excessive price," as it seems was the case the other day. The place for the coal operator in his present dealings with the Government is sitting upon one side of the table as a seller to the Government, and a man representing the Government and nothing else seated upon the other side of that table—that is, in deals for the Government—and the place for the coal operator, who is conducting a fair business, and not trying to put up prices, is at the mouth of his mine conducting his business; and if he is conspiring to put up prices, his place is behind the bars of a penitentiary, with a United States marshal standing over him.

It is not necessary to truckle and bow to these great business concerns. I would treat them fairly, yes; I would allow them good profits, yes; I would allow them even to make large profits. I would not put the Government in the position of being obliged to beg favors of them. I would let them understand that open competition between the mines of this country must be restored and that the conspiracies which have been hatched shall be punished. If you will do that, you will not need to find the members of the Cabinet engaged in controversies with each other about whether one of them agrees on too big a price for the people of the United States to pay for coal.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Before asking the Senator a question I should like to say I do not understand that Secretary Lane entered into any contract that the coal men might charge any definite price. I understand that all he did was to ask the coal operators to reduce the price to the public, whatever may be stated in the newspaper article. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he sees any objection to Secretary Lane making a speech to a committee or a convention of coal men and urging them to reduce the price to the public. I understand Secretary Daniels made a speech to the same effect. I do not understand that Secretary Lane entered into any contract or claimed the right to enter into any contract.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator then answer the question, What is the trouble in the Cabinet, and why is it that members of the Cabinet are saying they do not agree to the conditions which have been made?

Mr. KELLOGG. I know nothing about troubles in the Cabinet or why Secretary Baker wrote a letter. I simply wish to state that I understood all that Secretary Lane did was to ask them to reduce the price to the general public.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be permitted by the Senator from Missouri to say that it fell to my lot this morning to hear Secretary Lane make a statement? I assume he would not regard it a violation in connection with the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota if I reveal here the statement. The remarks he made concerning the price of coal were addressed to a gathering of coal producers, pointing out to them the obligation they owe the public at this particular time in order that they may inherit from the public a form of approval for patriotic conduct. He went so far as to point out upon the showing they made that a certain price was sufficient, and that did not relate to contracts which were then proposed or then existing. I might say to the able Senator from Missouri it was not coal for the Government's use, but turned upon a wholly different contract, and it in no wise at that time was the object or subject of Mr. Lane's remark or speech.

I also understand, let me tell the Senator, that the contract for the Government for coal was conducted by Secretary Daniels, and that whatever Secretary Lane did in that connection met with the approval of Secretary Daniels. Such I understand to be the situation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator from Illinois takes his seat, with the permission of the Senator from Missouri, may I inquire if it is not a fact that pursuant to the speech of Secretary Lane to which the Senator refers, and pursuant to an understanding which was then reached, a flat rate of $3 per ton was made by the coal dealers with respect to the coal which they sold to the public, and that they gave out to the public that that was the rate which thereafter would be charged for the contract?

Mr. LEWIS. I am unable to answer the able Senator with any knowledge on the subject. I have only the information I stated.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to say I am informed that Secretary Lane declined to name a figure to the coal men. I do not know anything about the price of coal, but $3 is a good deal less than they have been charging heretofore, and if he has brought about any reduction he has performed a service to the people of the United States.

Mr. KING. I think $3 is a good deal more than they have been charging heretofore. Is not that the fact?

Mr. KELLOGG. I know it is less than they have been charging up in my country. We have been paying five and six dollars a ton.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that just before the war they were selling it for $2 a ton?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know. I am not speaking about whether $3 a ton is a proper price for coal or not. I simply say I believe Secretary Lane performed a service if he got them to reduce the price at all, and I do not think he entered into a contract with the coal miners that they might charge any particular price. I have known Secretary Lane for a good many years and I know he is an able and conscientious man.

Mr. REED. I have not made an assault upon Secretary Lane. How quickly men will rush to a defense and protest that no wrong is being done! I commented merely upon the fact that they were mussing things up by calling in operators and agreeing to prices and immediately two other Cabinet officers say those prices are not fair. That is as far as I have gone. If Secretary Lane got a reduction, well and good; but I say if there is a combination among the coal men of this country to rob the people, if they put their prices to an excessive point, I do not believe the great Government of the United States needs to call those gentlemen into counsel. I believe we have some laws in this country for wretches of that kind, and the sooner those laws are enforced the sooner this kind of business will come to an end.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield to me just a moment to mention a fact I have recently heard? It is in corroboration of his criticism to the effect that the law is being violated.

I am advised that the prices of coal at the mines in Alabama and Tennessee were put up over one night $1.50 a ton within the past six or eight months. About the same time, while the supply of coal was short in the city of Atlanta, 1,200 carloads of coal were upon a sidetrack 6 miles out of Atlanta. The judge of the superior court called the grand jury's attention to the fact, and the next morning the coal cars were gone.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. I think I ought to yield to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who rose a little while ago, if he desires the floor. If not, I gladly yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BORAH. I think I will not interrupt the Senator. I was going to call attention to a paragraph in Mr. Baker's letter.

Mr. REED. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. A great deal of very interesting and valuable testimony upon this subject has been elicited in the last week before the Interstate Commerce Committee. I do not know whether the Senator from Missouri is familiar with it or not.

Mr. REED. I know but very little of it. I would like to have the Senator make the statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will allow me, I think I ought to say that in my judgment he is mistaken when he says that we have laws which will meet the trouble. I think the condition is this: The operators have not combined to exact a high price for coal. The buyers of coal are apparently so anxious to get it that they are bidding any price for it in quantities much greater than the mine operators are able to furnish. That is the chief cause for the high price of coal. There are more people who want coal and they want it in larger quantities than can be furnished at the mines at this time. I think we need additional legislation upon that subject. May I go one step further?

The testimony before the committee has shown with absolute clearness that the average cost of producing coal in this country at this time is not more than $1.50 a ton. There are some mines in which the cost would be a little greater than that, there are some mines in which it would be a little less than that, but I am well within the bounds when I say that the average cost of producing coal at the mouth of the mine loaded on cars at this time will not exceed $1.50 per ton, and no coal operator—and there were a score who appeared before our committee—asserted that a profit of 50 cents a ton would be an inadequate profit.

The difficulty is that the mine operators are being offered large prices for their coal. It is not in human nature to expect them to accept less than they are offered for the coal, and nothing but the hand of the law will be sufficient to keep coal at a reasonable price at this time under the conditions which now prevail.

Mr. REED. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. In my opinion the coal operators are wanting now to reimburse themselves for alleged losses which they have sustained in the last 10 years. I asked at least a half dozen of these operators in the course of the examination whether they thought it was fair to make the people of the country now pay a price for coal that would reimburse them for losses which they had sustained in the business several years ago, and without any exception at all they affirmed that they thought it was perfectly fair for them to charge prices now that would recoup the losses of the 5 or 10 years that are gone.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to ask the Senator from Iowa if he elicited from the coal producers any data with reference to the cost of producing coal prior to the beginning of the war so as to show what was the comparative cost?

Mr. CUMMINS. We elicited a great deal of information upon that point. The advance has varied in different mines, but there is no operator, as I remember it, who alleges a greater advance than 50 cents a ton. Possibly one went to 75 cents a ton in his particular locality or particular mine, but the average increase was not to exceed 50 cents a ton.

Mr. KING and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no right to yield. I rose to put this matter where I thought it ought to be in view of the testimony we have developed.

Mr. REED. Very well; I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Did the Senator in his investigation ascertain whether or not in the contracts which have been made for the sale of coal by the coal companies there was any provision by which if the coal companies sold in the season for a lower price rebates were to be paid to them?

Mr. CUMMINS. No evidence that I remember was developed upon that point. A great deal of coal is sold under contract which has for its basis the cost of production and with the provision that there is to be added to the cost of production a certain profit per ton. There is but little free coal, so to speak. Eighty per cent of all the coal production of this country is produced under contract, and there are very few contracts at this time, if any, that are as high as $3 a ton. Even the contracts made on the 1st of April of this year are, most of them, far below $3 a ton.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact, if the Senator will pardon me just there, that contracts have been made for the sale of large quantities of coal, as much as probably several hundred thousand tons, at $3 per ton, with the provision that if the coal continues to sell during the season at a less price there would be a rebate?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. KING. Is the investigation going on now by which the Senator could ascertain that fact?

Mr. CUMMINS. Having said so much, the conclusion from it all is that a fair profit to the operator would fix a price very much below $3 per ton; but I can not believe that the operators ought to be censured as wretches and as criminals, because they are neither. They are simply accepting prices which people are offering and are willing to pay. I think they are as patriotic and unselfish as the great body of the business men of the country. They have long ago adopted, as nearly every other business has adopted, the famous motto of transportation companies, namely——

Mr. REED. To charge all the traffic will bear.

Mr. CUMMINS. To charge all the traffic will bear. That is the motto of the business, and nothing but the Government can ever take that motto out of the business.

If I may be permitted, I ought to say at this point that I believe the provisions of this bill are entirely inadequate to meet the situation. I do not believe that the licensing section—and it is the only one which can grapple with these conditions—will enable the people of the country to secure their coal at a fair price. If we intend to do anything with it we ought to go at it directly and in the only way in which we can go at it, namely, to have the Government take all the coal at the mouth of the mine, paying the operators a fair price, and in turn selling to the people at a fair price.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether his committee has elicited information as to the real cause of the high prices being the shortage of cars?

Mr. CUMMINS. We have taken a great deal of testimony upon that point. In my judgment, the shortage of transportation—I use that term rather than the shortage of cars—is the initial cause of the high prices of coal. The shortage of transportation has induced or driven the buyers of coal to offer high prices for coal, inasmuch as the supply has been very much less than the demand.

But, speaking of the shortage of transportation or shortage of cars, everybody knows that the coal men of this country have received only about 60 per cent of the transportation which was allotted to them at the beginning of the year—that is, they have been able to ship only about 60 per cent of the coal which they were easily capable of producing. The railroad committee that has been organized under the Council of National Defense has issued recently a bulletin describing some of its efforts in remedying the alleged shortage of transportation. We have all been under the impression that the railroad companies needed a very great number of cars more than they now have in order to do the business of the country.

I think it would be well to call the attention of the Senate to that bulletin. They report that we have, in round numbers, 2,500,000 freight cars in this country owned by the railway companies and by private transporters or shippers as well. They say that they can make a saving of four and a half per cent in reducing the time that a certain percentage of the cars are in the shops for repair. That saving adds 64,000 cars to our system of transportation. They say that they can add 5 miles per hour to the movement of freight cars. The average movement now is 25 miles a day. That is the average movement of a freight car in the United States. That will add 520,000 cars to our transportation system. They say they can add 2 tons in loading each freight car.

Mr. REED. Who says that?

Mr. CUMMINS. That will add 200,000 cars to our system. So the railway companies themselves now say that without the addition of a single car they can add in effect 779,000 cars to the efficiency of our system and thus remove substantially if not entirely the alleged car shortage of the country.

I beg the Senator's pardon. I ought not to have interposed so long.

Mr. REED. The Senator has been making a very interesting statement, and he has said "They say." Who does he mean say that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I could not resist the temptation to suggest that if we are going to enter—and I am in favor of the Government entering—this field we should enter it in a way that will produce results instead of skirting around the edges and endeavoring to rely upon the voluntary arrangements of irresponsible committees.

Mr. REED. The Senator did not hear my question a moment ago. He used the expression several times "They say" and then referred to the freight-car situation. Who made the statement the Senator has been referring to?

Mr. CUMMINS. It has been so universal that I can hardly attach authorship to it. I have heard the railway companies themselves declare the car shortage so often that I came to accept it as conclusive and certain; and it was not until this testimony appeared before the committee that I became aware that by just a little efficiency—just a little common sense—in the operation of our railway system the cars we have could be made to render the service we now imperatively need.

Mr. REED. What I am trying to get at is who gives the testimony that all these reforms can be effected. Who has made that statement?

Mr. CUMMINS. The bulletin to which I referred is the one issued by the railroad committee operating under the Council of National Defense. That committee is composed of the presidents of half dozen of the prominent railroad companies of the country.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator takes his seat, he has said there is nothing that the criminal law of the country will reach. Is the Senator prepared to say there has not been a concert of action among certain of the coal companies with reference to the price of coal?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not the least evidence of it, and there really is no necessity for it. I do not suggest that they would not combine if they found it necessary; but when there are a half dozen people bidding for 1 ton of coal, willing, in order to keep from freezing to death or in order to keep industries in operation, to pay any price for it, a combination among the sellers is not required to maintain exorbitant prices.

Mr. REED. I wish to say to the Senator, because I do not want the question to go by in that way, statements have been made to me similar to the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] of coal having been raised in price at the same time by a large number of mine operators; that on the same day the price goes up, and substantially the same amount. This has come to me from a number of other sources.

If that is true, and I assume it must be true, there must be some concert of action. If there is no concert of action, no conspiracy whatever, then it is absolutely certain that in a few days' time all the excessive price would have disappeared, because the market would come to be supplied at the high prices, and the mine owner will find he has to sell at lower prices; in other words, the law of competition will come in. However, I do not want to be misunderstood. I am perfectly willing that anything shall be done to get us the relief that can be reasonably employed, but I do say I am of the opinion that a prompt application of the criminal laws of the country to this situation would have ended it long ago.

Now, I promised to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to be understood as asserting that there is no combination. I only say that, so far as the testimony to which I have referred is concerned, I heard none that would be proof of a combination, and in view of the enormous demand for coal and the limited supply of coal under the circumstances I can see no reason for combining when the operator can get any price he sees fit to ask for his product.

Mr. REED. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word in regard to the price of coal. I have listened with a good deal of interest to these statements, and while this matter has not been fully developed before the Interstate Commerce Committee, I assert the fact to be that the price of coal at the mines in Ohio and western Pennsylvania has not only been increased 50 cents a ton but it has been increased in many instances 100 per cent and even 200 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think more than that.

Mr. POMERENE. I think so. I think further that many of the coal operators have said it is the rule of supply and demand that controls. That is not true in my judgment. The rule of supply and demand is not permitted to operate here. The only rule which has controlled the price of coal has been the rule of necessity. When it comes to getting coal enough to warm a poor washerwoman and her family her necessities are such that she has been paying an exorbitant and outrageous price. There is not any defense that can be made by any mortal of those prices. I shall have something to say on this subject to-morrow.

Mr. REED. What is the opinion of the Senator from Ohio, who has been on the committee—I think, indeed, he is the chairman of the subcommittee making the investigation—as to whether there is evidence tending to convince him that there is a concert of action among at least a part of the coal operators?

Mr. POMERENE. The evidence will show if they ever investigate it, and we have investigated it in part in certain localities in Ohio and in Pittsburgh, that they have bureaus or organizations. Each coal operator is a member of a bureau. He sends in a statement to the bureau showing the amount of coal he has mined and sold and the price he has received for it. Immediately upon these returns being made to the bureau a complete statement is issued to each member of that particular organization showing the total amount of coal sold by each operator and the price he received for it.

It is pretended that this is in the interest of the consumer, because they can with this information reduce prices. The actual experience has been during the last six months in Ohio and West Virginia and in Pennsylvania that the prices have been raised, and I think that that part of it is a good subject for investigation by the Federal grand jury. I propose before we get through to give some of the information I have to the grand jury; but I do not agree with the Senator from Missouri that there is sufficient legislation now upon the books. Many a man can violate the law to the detriment of millions and millions of people, and he may not be made amenable to the law.

Mr. REED. I do not think the Senator is warranted in saying that I made the statement that there is enough legislation now and that I am not willing to enact further legislation.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator did not so understand me, but I did make the statement that if the legislation now on the books was employed you would not have much trouble in breaking coal prices; but I am willing that they shall be broken in any other way that they can be.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say a few words regarding the coal supply as brought out in the recent investigation before the Interstate Commerce Committee. According to this evidence the normal demand for coal in the United States is about 600,000,000 tons a year, or 50,000,000 tons a month. It is said there is now an increased demand, and there is likely to be a still further increased demand by reason of the war and by reason of the necessities of our allies, so that it is said that the reasonable demands for coal for America during the next year will be about 100,000,000 tons in excess of the past requirement, namely, that the demand will be for 700,000,000 tons. The country has not, however, of late had its normal supply of coal. The mine operators all attribute that to the fact that there has been what they call a car shortage. Upon inquiring as to that of the railway operators we find that there has been an extraordinary demand for these very cars for other things paying higher freight and perhaps of greater necessity—munitions of war, and so forth—so that the mines have not always been supplied with the cars into which they can immediately load the coal produced. There is very little coal stored at the mine; it is brought out of the mine and immediately put upon the cars; it is then carried to the place of destination.

Of this total of production of 600,000,000 tons of coal in a year it is claimed that about 80 per cent is under contract to the railroads and the factories and only about 15 or 20 per cent is loose, and is what they call "free coal" or "spot coal." It is said that an extraordinary demand has been precipitated upon that small surplus of 15 or 20 per cent of the total production and that the excessive prices have been in the main confined to this so-called spot or free coal, and undoubtedly that has been made the subject of an extraordinary demand and the sport of speculators in the market. Whether they have acted in violation of law or not I do not know, and no sufficient evidence has been produced as to that.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I do not want to stop the trend of the Senator's discourse, but he speaks of the prices being made the sport of speculators in the market.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Has not the price been raised at the mouth of the mine by the mine operators to large purchasers?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It has been, and has produced a great reluctance upon the part of the mine owners, as I understand, to contract for coal, except at increased rates. They insist that their expenses of mining are increasing, that the number of men available for work is diminishing, and so forth.

I have not the slightest doubt that if the railway operators succeed in operating efficiently the present number of cars annually—2,500,000 or 2,600,000 cars, and make them more efficient by reducing the period in which they are laid up for repairs, by increasing the speed and so forth—I have not the slightest doubt there will be an enormously increased production, which will quickly result in a reduction of the price of coal, just as was instanced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on Saturday, with reference to potatoes. When that time will come I do not know. It depends upon the efficiency of the car system and upon the economies of time which are to be worked out by the railway operators. I imagine that the stress of war may bring upon the car system a tremendous strain for other things than these low-priced products, such as coal. I can understand, of course, how the railroads themselves will prefer to carry the high-priced products paying a higher rate of freight, rather than the low-priced products that pay a lower rate of freight. So those things may operate to the derangement of the plan.

I agree with the Senator from Iowa that other legislation is needed. I think there is great force in what the Senator from Missouri has stated with reference to the law of supply and demand ultimately regulating these things. I believe that if the car shortage could be done away with to-day and the mines could quickly put into the cars the coal which they currently produce, the price of coal in this country would go down just as the price of potatoes has gone down.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, all of this is very interesting and illuminating, but all of it is very far from the question I started out to discuss. Since, however, we are on the theme, let me state what I believe the evidence will disclose: That is, that after all excuses have been offered the fact will remain that mine operators have advanced the price of coal at the mouth of the mine, and in a great many instances they have advanced it to an enormous extent. That is not speculation in the sense in which we employ that term; that is a question of raising the price of coal by the owner of it.

If you concede that right, you certainly do not have to concede along with it the right of the mine operator to agree with other mine operators to advance the price of coal at the same time, because when that is done the criminal statutes of our country are violated. I have not the slightest doubt in saying that proper investigation will disclose enough facts to warrant an indictment of more than one of these gentlemen. If it is necessary to enact further legislation to accomplish a desired result in order that extortions of this kind shall not be practiced, I am ready to join in that legislation. Just now, however, I want to call the attention of the Senate back to a little point in controversy.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADY in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to add a few words to what I have already said?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, an extraordinary demand has been precipitated on the supply of spot coal or free coal on the market. As an evidence of that, the factories of New England, having lost their usual supply this year from Nova Scotia, were terrorized with reference to the situation, and they went into Ohio itself, which is a great coal-producing State, and bought coal so recklessly as to raise the price to an unprecedented figure. In that way they produced a stringency in the coal market which affected every factory in the State of Ohio. The Senator can see, therefore, that there was a cause for increasing this price quite above and beyond any cause existing in the combination of the jobbers or the controllers of the coal.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understand that there was consternation everywhere. We have had enough wild talk to scare everybody to death in this country. It has been usually about food, but it has been also about everything else. If we had a few less Jeremiahs in this country going about pouring forth their lamentations and telling us about the evil that is to fall upon us, there would be less terror in the minds of people; there would be less of an attempt to grab everything in sight, and we would not need so much governmental control. Every Senator who stood in this Senate and every man who stood outside of it telling the country that it is going to starve to death has been in part responsible for these high prices. Every man who has dared say anything to the contrary has been pictured to the country as a pro-German.

Mr. President, returning to our muttons, the question was raised here that there had been no attempt made by anybody to regulate the price of coal by making any contracts. I had made a statement that I had read something of that kind in the newspapers. I did not mean that it was an ordinary contract, but that there was an arrangement, an agreement. I was quoting ordinary newspapers. I know that the newspapers make mistakes; but I know that there is one newspaper that never makes a mistake. I refer to the Official Bulletin. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who has the temerity to challenge any word which he may find in that document. It has the stamp of "genuine" blown in the bottle, and here is what I read in the issue of June 29, the headline being:

Big cut in soft-coal prices, beginning July 1, is made voluntarily by mining operators at conference with Government officials—Schedule of rates will be tentative until cost investigation is completed—Secretary Lane lauds producers.

This is the article:

The Committee on Public Information has issued the following:

Three dollars for bituminous coal on cars as it comes from the mine, $3.50 for lump sizes, and a reduction of 50 cents on every ton for the Government are the maximum prices, with few exceptions, that coal operators will take for their product beginning July 1.

This reduction from prices at the mouth of the mine—

"At the mouth of the mine." I call the attention of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to that statement—ranging as high as $5.50—

Mark you now, this is bituminous coal—was arranged in a meeting of the special committee of the operators, the committee on coal production of the Council of National Defense, Secretary Lane, and Gov. Fort, of the Federal Trade Commission.

Trade secrets between competitors, cost prices, and other confidential information was laid on the table, and the Government, acting as judge, decided, with the entire approval of the operators, what would be the highest prices paid at mines for coal—

And if Secretaries Baker and Daniels are correct, there is no reason why the mine operators should not have given their entire approval to the prices—prices to go into effect on July 1, to stay in effect until investigations are made and these prices are raised or lowered.

Representatives from various States were asked to quote the minimum price at which they could furnish coal. The Clearfield district of Pennsylvania agreed to cut its price for coal as it was loaded at the mouth of the mine from $5.25 to $3, with $3.50 for lump sizes.

Tennessee came down from $4.50 to $3. Virginia did likewise. West Virginia reduced the current contract price of $5.60 to $3, and Illinois and Indiana reduced their prices to $2.75 for coal as it came from the mine. Alabama, which mines under difficult conditions with special expenses, reduced its price from $5.50 to $3 at the lowest and $4 at the highest. Maryland lowered its estimate from $5.75 to the standard figures. All the remaining districts east of Illinois that were represented also agreed to the new figures except one or two with special conditions, which were deferred for further consideration. Only the districts west of Illinois—Iowa, Wyoming, Colorado, Oklahoma, and the Southwest—which were not represented, remain yet to be counted, and there is no doubt whatever in the minds of the coal committee of the Council of National Defense that these districts will agree to the price reduction.

These figures met the entire approval of Chairman Peabody and his colleagues and of Secretary Lane and Commissioner Fort. In several instances they discussed frankly the situation in certain districts with the representatives from those districts, while asking for lower figures, and in each instance they met the hearty cooperation of the operators.

Again I remark that if Secretary Baker and Secretary Daniels are right, it is no wonder they met the hearty cooperation of the operators—

Mr. Peabody explained also that in line with the promises he had made in the open sessions of the convention he would, if request were made to him to do so, see that the standard price was altered to allow for special conditions, if his views coincided with those of the other Government agencies, and that any increase in labor costs would also be allowed, pending, and afterwards also, the fixing of permanent prices that will be undertaken as soon as careful investigation of costs has been made.

So that it appears that if they have not fixed prices, they intend to fix permanent prices. Now, this is official; this is from the Official Bulletin.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I do for a question, but I desire to finish reading this article.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to make an explanation.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will not make an explanation of anything that appears in the Official Bulletin. That document ought to stand without a word being taken from or added to it, even by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator would not want that rule to obtain longer than 30 days, would he?

Mr. REED. Well, I do not know; I am a little tender about interfering with this publication.

Just as the session was about to end Secretary Lane told the operators:

"This is a distinctly novel proceeding. You are pioneers in a good move. We look back with respect and admiration upon those who crossed the hard and stony and waterless places and picked out the richer spots beyond. I hope that you will be looked upon not only by those who succeed you in the coal business but by the industries of the United States with respect and admiration for the manner in which you have acted at this conference.

"You have responded as to a call by the people of the United States. You are not a removed class. You are business men. You belong to the people. Most of you are men who were not born to wealth. You have come up out of the soil like the rest of us. You have shown sympathy with the people and understanding of your relation to them.

Just think of saying that to a lot of fellows who have put the price of bituminous coal at the mouth of the mine up to $5.50 a ton.

"That is everything in a democracy. Unless we maintain in our minds always the consciousness of the sources of power in this country democracy is a failure.

Everyone will catch the logical connection between the last sentences and those that immediately precede them.

REASON TO BE PROUD.

"You have been up against an extremely odd situation and now you have acted hero and met the situation in magnificent fashion. I think you have reason to be proud of what you have done. You have said to the American people that you are not going to be oblivious to the rights of those from whom you sprang. You will protect them. That is spirit of the kind that makes for the success of this country. If all the industries of the United States will make the same effort there will be no question as to whether our people can mobilize our resources. We must not work singly and alone for selfish ends in the hope of reaping rich rewards that will distinguish us merely as men who are in industry as makers of money. We must work as the men who have landed in Europe yesterday must work—in battalions and regiments and companies, with one mind, one purpose, marching forward to victory—victory not for ourselves but victory for the country. We are the greatest business Nation on earth. Therefore we must look to the business men to lead and inspirit us and our people, and I think that the word that goes out from this gathering will be inspiriting to all."

By agreement with the operators the coal committee has deferred treatment of the anthracite problem until after the 1st of July. Seven anthracite operators were represented at the meeting to-day. It is expected that the anthracite dealers will meet the Government in exactly the way that the bituminous dealers have done.

Thus endeth the first lesson.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I will yield in a moment. I understand the Senator wants to make a little speech, and I will give him the opportunity, but before I leave this interesting subject in connection with this very classical eulogy and with that statement of it which reads:

We look back with respect and admiration upon those who crossed the hard and stony and waterless places and picked out the richer spot beyond.

I desire to read from the Washington Post—all the papers, however, carried it—this item:

Secretary Baker, as president of the Council of National Defense, repudiated last night an agreement fixing a tentative price of $3 a ton for bituminous coal reached at a conference here Thursday between coal producers, Secretary Lane a member of the defense council, members of the council's coal-production committee, and the Federal Trade Commission.

"Neither the council nor its committee," Secretary Baker said in a letter to W. S. Gifford, of the council, "has power to fix prices."

"UNJUST," HE DECLARES.

Mr. Baker added $3 at the mines suggested for bituminous coal is "exorbitant, unjust, and oppressive."

I desire to insert without reading the remainder of the article as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Secretary Daniels, another member of the council, earlier in the day said the agreement would in no way affect coal purchases for the Navy.

The Navy, he said, will continue to buy from the mines at $2.33 a ton, leaving a price to be determined after the Federal Trade Commission has ascertained production costs.

DENIES AGREEMENT'S LEGALITY.

In his letter to Mr. Gifford, Mr. Baker asserted that he believed no members of the defense council disagreed with him as to the limitations of the powers of the council and its committees and as to the effect of the action taken.

The fact that the conferences were attended by members of the council and of the trade commission, he declared, gave no legality to the agreement.

The price-fixing agreement was reached after 400 operators called here by the coal-production committee had adopted resolutions authorizing their committees to give assent to such maximum bituminous prices as might be named by the Secretary of the Interior, the Federal Trade Commission, and the coal committee.

OPERATORS FEARED PROSECUTION.

The resolution was reported by Trade Commissioner Fort from a special committee.

In presenting it for adoption Mr. Fort declared he believed it was entirely safe for the conference to adopt, and that any responsibility as to the legality of fixing prices was put on the Government, and not on the operators, under the terms of the resolution.

Some operators had expressed a fear that they might be prosecuted under the antitrust laws if they entered into an agreement among themselves to lower prices.

An official announcement made through the public information committee said that in the final conference cost prices and other confidential information was laid on the table and the Government representatives, acting as judges, decided what would be the highest prices paid at the mines—the prices to go into effect July 1 and to remain in effect until investigations are made and other prices arranged.

SECRETARY BAKER'S LETTER.

Secretary Baker last night indicated that as president of the defense council he had received no notification of the arrangement reached at the conferences. His letter to Mr. Gifford said:

"My attention has been called through the newspapers to the action reported to have been taken at Washington, D. C., during the past week by the so-called committee on coal production of the Council of National Defense, in cooperation with certain coal producers and representatives of coal-mining enterprises, with regard to the price of bituminous and anthracite coal.

"The facts seem to be that the coal-production committee invited to Washington various coal operators and arranged a conference between them, members of the coal-production committee, and members of the Federal Trade Commission, leading to the adoption of resolutions in favor of an early and accurate determination of the costs involved in the production of bituminous and anthracite coal, as a basis for some future action by some official agency of the Government in fixing fair and just prices for these products, should any such agency be given power to do so.

"Pending such an ascertainment of costs this meeting seems to have adopted a resolution whereby the operators present agreed to sell bituminous coal at a price not higher than $3 per ton, and that this obligation should remain in force until some such action had been taken by an authorized governmental agency.

"The color which has been given to this meeting and this resolution in the newspapers may well mislead the public into believing that the Council of National Defense has either undertaken itself to fix the price of coal or to sanction its being fixed by the coal-production committee or that committee in conjunction with the coal operators.

"I, therefore, as president of the Council of National Defense, write this to say that the Council of National Defense has no legal power and claims no legal power, either to fix the price of coal or to fix a maximum price for coal or any other product.

BEYOND LEGAL POWER.

"The coal-production committee is a subordinate committee of the Council of National Defense, purely advisory in its character, formed for the purpose of advising the council as to steps which might be recommended leading to a stimulation of production and distribution of coal.

"No power has been even attempted to be delegated to it to consider or deal with the question of price, and any action taken by that committee or sanctioned by that committee dealing with price, either fixed or maximum, for coal is clearly beyond the legal power of the coal-production committee and of the Council of National Defense, from which the committee derives whatever authority it has.

CALLS THE PRICE UNJUST.

"As you are aware, the Federal Trade Commission has been directed by the President to ascertain for his information the costs involved in coal production.

"I am to some extent familiar with the progress made by the commission. The information I have from that and other sources, I think, justified me in believing that the price of $3, suggested or agreed on, as a maximum, is an exorbitant, unjust, and oppressive price.

WRITTEN FOR GUIDANCE.

"The fact that these conferences were attended by members of the Federal Trade Commission and by members of the Council of National Defense, of course, adds nothing to their legal powers, and I am sure that none of my associates in the council will dissent from the view I have herein expressed, both on the limitation upon the powers of the council and the coal-production committee, and the effect of the action alleged to have been taken.

"I write this for the information of the coal-production committee, and for the guidance of all other subcommittees of the council."

SECRETARY LANE SILENT.

Mr. Baker's letter caused much surprise among those officials who considered that the Government had accomplished a notable achievement in inducing the coal operators to agree to a price far below that now effective.

Secretary Lane and the other officials declined to comment, but it was pointed out that Secretary Baker spoke only in his capacity as head of the defense council, and that he did not attempt to repudiate the approval given the operators' new price scale by Interior Department and Federal Trade Commission officials.

SEVERAL EXPLANATIONS OFFERED.

Several explanations for the letter are suggested to-night among those familiar with the situation.

One was that the Department of Justice is anxious that the fate of pending prosecutions in New York against a few coal operators be not jeopardized by the action taken here regarding prices.

Those who take a different view believe that in the near future there may be an issue in the Cabinet that will involve the very problem presented in this case.

VIEWS IN CABINET DIFFER.

Some members of the Cabinet are understood to feel that the best way to handle big business interests in war time is to appeal to their sense of patriotism and fair play, and that a little more than ordinary profit would not be a bad thing if it would stimulate production.

Another group is understood to feel that there must be a constant use of the great power of government to coerce business interests to give the lowest possible prices.

How deep the difference goes has not become apparent, but it is possible that a reappearance will lead to many difficulties among officials.

Mr. REED. In this connection I desire to call attention to the membership of the committee on coal production, one of the advisory committees of the Council of National Defense:

Committee on coal production: F. S. Peabody, president Peabody Coal Co., Chicago, chairman; E. J. Berwind, president Berwind-White Coal Mining Co., New York—

I will put in the remainder of the names without reading. I simply put them in in order that we may know that nearly all of the leading coal operators of the country are on the Council of National Defense, and it is with some curiosity I inquire why these gentleman, at least, did not keep their mine product at a decent price? If they had done so there would have been no possibility of cornering the coal market of the United States. I now ask that the names to which I have referred be put in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The committee on coal production in full is as follows:

Committee on coal production: F. S. Peabody, president Peabody Coal Co., Chicago, chairman; E. J. Berwind, president Berwind-White Coal Mining Co, New York; W. W. Keefer, president Pittsburgh Terminal Railroad & Coal Co., Pittsburgh; Van. H. Manning, Director United States Bureau of Mines, Washington; C. M. Moderwell, president United Coal Mining Co., Chicago; E. L. Pierce, vice president Semet Solvey Co., Syracuse; Erskine Ramsey, vice president Pratt Consolidated Coal Co., Birmingham; George Otis Smith, Director United States Geological Survey, Washington; James J. Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senator from Missouri, I would like to say a few words right here regarding Secretary Lane's action and the action of the Council of National Defense and the coal operators upon the subject of coal.

In the first place, almost all of the coal that has been currently produced during the last six months or a year has been produced upon contracts, so that these high prices did not prevail with reference to that coal. The excessive prices relate only to the spot coal, the free coal that is on the market, and, of course, the market price being fixed in that way, the coal operator is enabled—at least in satisfying current demands—to charge the market price. So I have no doubt that, outside of their contracts, the price charged for coal by the operators at the mines has ranged about $5 or $5.50, responding to the market.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator let me ask him a question there, because he has investigated this question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. What was the price last year for the same kind of coal at the mines?

Mr. NEWLANDS. About a dollar and a half per ton, as stated by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. REED. Now, if the Senator will let me ask him there a further question I will try not to interrupt him again in his interruption of my address. Will the Senator please tell me why the patriotic gentlemen composing the committee on coal production, whose names appear in the pamphlet that the Senator himself had printed as a part of the Council of National Defense—why those distinguished gentlemen did not reduce the price voluntarily or keep it down where it ought to be?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the answer of the coal operators who appeared before our committee was that they were advised that they could not legally meet together and agree upon a price, even though the result was a reduction of price.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is not what I meant. I want to make my question clear. The Senator states that the price of coal last year at the mines was about a dollar and a half, I think, and that it went up to about five dollars and a half. Now, what I am asking the Senator is this: Here are a lot of coal operators serving on the Council of National Defense. Why did not these gentlemen, in the interest of the public and of fairness, each for himself, without combination with others, refrain from skinning the public by raising the price from a dollar and a half to five dollars and a half? Why did they not simply do the fair thing by the public? There are enough of them serving on the coal production committee to have prevented any such price as that being extorted. Now, does the Senator mean to tell me or the Senate or the country that these men came before the committee and said they could not each individually reduce the price at their own mines for fear the Government would prosecute them for reducing the price?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am not here to defend the coal operators, but I am here to state the facts. I do not know whether or not these gentlemen, Mr. Peabody and others, who are on this committee, and whose names the Senator has given, have charged an excessive price. I do not know whether they held to the old price or whether they adopted the new price. The men on the subcommittee of the National Council of Defense were only a few of the numerous producers of and operators in coal. All I know is that operators who appeared before us, when the suggestion was made that they should all meet together in a patriotic way and agree with each other that the price should be materially reduced, stated that they would be glad to get together, but that they were advised that such a getting together would be a violation of the Sherman antitrust law, even though its result was to fix the price at a figure lower than the price prevailing.

The Senator says that all these men were guilty of extortion, because they raised the price from $1.50 a year ago to $5.50. What is the story told by the operators in reference to that? Their statement was that for 10 years, in the main, the bituminous coal industry has been substantially without profit, and it seemed to be generally conceded that that was the fact; that during this period of low prices they had been receiving under many contracts simply the cost of production, with 25 or 50 cents per ton added.

They made large contracts of that kind with railroads and with great factory consumers of coal; and they stated that many of them felt that they were justified, during a period of advance of prices brought about by an increased demand operating upon a limited supply, in taking those prices and making up the losses of the past. That was their statement.

Now, as to the policy that should be pursued. Here we are upon the verge of a great diminution in the labor market, a diminution in the number of employees, less men bidding for the job, and a consequent increase in the wages, and also a corresponding increase in the price of all the materials that are bought by the producers of anything, whether the product be from the mine or from the factory. It would be unfair, therefore, to confine them absolutely to the price prevailing in the period of production when the supply exceeded the demand and when the price was necessarily low.

The Senator from Missouri insists that he wants the application of the law of supply and demand everywhere, and he insists that in the end it will correct every evil with reference to prices. Well, the law of supply and demand means that when there is a diminished demand for a fixed supply the prices go down, and, correspondingly, it means that when there is an increased demand for a fixed supply the prices go up. So the Senator, it seems to me, can not consistently arraign the high prices which come simply as the result of the law of supply and demand if there is no element of combination in restraint of trade to enhance the price.

Now, let me say a few words further.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just let me call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to this fact: Of course the rule that the Senator has just announced ought to be applied to the farmer, and he ought to have the benefit of it as well as anybody else, ought he not? And if we are going to take away from the farmer his free and open market, his world market, we ought at least to see to it that he is permitted to buy in a market where the prices are as well controlled as his own prices.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That seems logical.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will help us put that in the bill before we get through.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am simply addressing myself now to the law of supply and demand. It seems that as a matter of morals the producers must accept low prices when the supply is greater than the demand, and that, on the other hand, as a matter of morals, that the consumers should not arraign as dishonest the high prices created by a demand in excess of the supply. Now, of course, outside of that, we have to consider the question of regulation. When any commodity becomes so affected with a public interest as to compel the regulation of the price in the interest of the public, then it is the duty of the Government to intervene. But I have not the time to go into that subject at present.

Mr. President, I have already stated that there were reasons for an increased price beyond the abnormally low price created by overproduction and underconsumption. What did England do under these conditions when the war came? England saw that it was necessary to increase the supply, and that the best way of producing an increased supply was to raise the price. When England determined to regulate this matter, what did she do? She immediately permitted the operators to add a dollar a ton to the current price. Add a dollar a ton to the pre-war price of one dollar and a half a ton in America, and you have two dollars and a half a ton as the price of the coal at the mine. What did England do in addition to that? The suggestion was made that they should furnish coal to the allies at the same price.

England said, "No; we will allow our coal operators to get a little extra from them," and therefore she provided that the price to foreign purchasers, even the allies, should be 2 shillings and 6 pence in addition to that. Therefore the total additional price, so far as foreigners were concerned—even the allies themselves—was $1.62½, which, if the standard price prior to that time had been $1.50 a ton, would have raised the price to over $3 a ton.

Why did England do that? Because she said it was important, whilst guarding against sky-rocket prices for coal under the extraordinary demands of war, that at the same time production should be increased, and that the best way of stimulating production was to give the producer and his workmen larger compensation; and, as I understand, one of the purposes of this 62½ cents, concurrently with it, was to permit an increase in the wages of the men in the mines to a corresponding amount, or an amount approximating it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what about the wages of the other people who do not work in the mines, but have to burn coal? Are they to be increased, too?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know what was done over there with reference to them, but I understand there was a general increase of wages throughout.

Mr. REED. I am speaking about this country.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am talking about England.

Mr. REED. Oh, we know how the Englishmen got their increase in wages. They demanded it. I hope we will not have a demand of the same kind and in the way made in this country. I hope there will be no demand by strikes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. We also know that England was compelled by the stress of war, practically to take control of the industries.

Mr. REED. But I am talking about the situation here. I understand that the Senator now justifies the increase in the price of coal by a dollar a ton in this country on the ground that it will tend to encourage the mine owners to produce, and that, in the opinion of the Senator, there ought to be an increase in the wages of the miners. Now I am asking him what he is going to do with the rest of the people who have to consume coal? Are their wages, their salaries, their compensations, and so forth, to be advanced also?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Missouri will pardon me if I do not allow myself to digress into that field now. I am confining myself to one question, and that is the question of coal; and I am not doing so with a view to justifying anything. I am simply stating the facts, and the economic facts, that led to this increase of price.

Now, then, I ask, What did Secretary Lane and the Council of National Defense find themselves confronted with? Why, a condition where the operators were afraid to combine even to reduce prices.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator let me interrupt him and ask him why it was necessary to combine to reduce prices?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Because they could not rely upon the good faith of everybody in the industry; and, unless they all did it, obviously those who did not take part in it would reap a large profit at the expense of the others.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, the man who himself sold at the reduced price would still get a fair profit. What right, then, did he have to refuse to sell, taking a fair profit, because somebody else might practice extortion?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not pretend to justify the quality of human nature which impels a man to accept for a commodity which he produces the price which other people accept and which is current in the markets, whether that price be exorbitant or not. It is human nature to accept the current price; and if you appeal to the patriotism of a great body of operators to reduce that current price which is the result of a current demand, of course you diminish their enthusiasm with reference to such an arrangement if they find that one-third or one-fourth or one-half of their numbers refuse to come into the understanding. It is human nature. I am not here as an apologist for human nature. It is a fact that a man will get what he can for what he has. I am talking, of course, about the market rates. I am not talking about extortion or anything of that kind.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator apply that last remark of his—that it is human nature for people to get what they can—to those members of the Council of National Defense who are there representing their own business and themselves in dealing with the Government?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think they would do that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; except in so far as they are constrained by a sense of responsibility because of the position which they have accepted and the moral obligation which they have assumed by reason of it.

Mr. President, I was inquiring what situation, then, confronted Secretary Lane and the Council of National Defense when this vast body of operators met? Why, there was nothing in the law which provided for a regulation of prices. There is nothing in pending legislation, so far as I know, that provides for fixing of prices. Therefore they were confronted with a market price of five dollars and a half a ton, with a prospect of an increase. It takes some time to set to work the machinery of regulating and controlling the price. They have already started that machinery through the Federal Trade Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission recently came before our committee with a report upon the subject; and what do they report? They reported that the previous cost of production of coal at the mines was about a dollar and a half a ton, and they advised our Government to use a system similar to that of England, and to add $1 a ton in order to stimulate production.

It is very clear that the most important thing for the prosecution of this war is coal. A scanty coal supply may imperil the successful prosecution of the war. Coal is not only essential to transportation but it is essential to the production of every fabricated thing that we know of, and lies at the very basis of production, for it is through coal that power is created. As a matter of public policy, then, what are you to do? Act as you would in normal times and simply fix the normal price prior to the war demand? Or are you to recognize the fact that an increased price will stimulate production and give you the material that will enable you to win the war?

The Federal Trade Commission, inquiring about costs of coal all over the country, recommended that we should pursue the same policy that England had pursued, and that was to add $1 a ton to the price of coal which prevailed before the war, which would make it $2.50 a ton.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, does the Senator understand now that in this conference $1 a ton was added to the price of coal upon the theory that the Senator has just enunciated?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know what process of reasoning was pursued in the discussion; but undoubtedly they knew about all of these conditions, and I have not the slightest doubt that this very reason operated upon their minds. What advantage, then, did they gain? Why, that during this period of discussion and contention as to what we should do, an arrangement was made whereby they agreed that the price should not exceed $3 a ton until the Government could ascertain the cost and determine a definite war policy with reference to this commodity. They also agreed that for the supply of coal to the Government itself the price should be 50 cents per ton less than the $3 charged to the general public.

Now, I ask, was not that the businesslike thing to do, apart from any consideration of whether or not the law forbade it? Just as a pure business transaction, whilst we are in this condition of contention as to whether we will regulate prices at all; and, if so, how we shall regulate them; and when we are in this condition of uncertainty as to what the costs are and as to what the price should be, if we can get a reduction from the general market price of $5.50 a ton to $3 a ton for the general public and $2.50 to the Government, is it not the wise and businesslike thing to do? Was not Secretary Lane somewhat justified, in the elation of the moment, when he congratulated on their action this great body of three or four hundred coal operators who, having the opportunity within the next three months to reap profits that would recompense them for the losses of years, yielded this advantage voluntarily as an act of patriotism?

Recollect that the consumption of coal in this country is 50,000,000 tons a month. A reduction of $2 a ton means $100,000,000 a month which the coal operators of this country waived and conceded to the patriotic insistence of Secretary Lane.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think the Senator from Missouri was informed about these facts. I am sure he has a generous temperament and that he is not disposed to criticize unduly public officials acting as they do, with reference to matters the facts of which are not generally known. So I thought I would develop these facts before he proceeded further with his argument, and particularly with those powers of satire and invective which he possesses to such an extraordinary degree.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Nevada a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator that coal is indispensable in the prosecution of the war, and that, in the language employed in the discussion of this bill, it is impressed with a "public" character or a "public nature" to a greater extent than any other article, unless it be wheat, steel, or copper. In view of the fact that the spirit seems to be that everybody should charge all that they can and then a little more, does not the Senator think it was unwise for Secretary Lane and the Council of National Defense, or whoever participated in the matter, to give the impression—indeed, to make a tentative arrangement—that coal prices should be doubled? Does not the Senator appreciate what the effect is throughout the country? Instead of officials attempting to stabilize prices in the interest of the people and the Government, they have approved a program—temporary, at least—which doubles the price of coal, and I am afraid that their course will be regarded as permission by everybody else who has something to sell to double and treble the price of the commodities held by them for sale. Does not the Senator think it is a bad example and that it will affect in a disadvantageous manner the future operations of the Government and the public in the purchase and sale of articles essential in this great crisis?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the facts were as the Senator states, doubtless the action would have been very unwise; but the Senator bases his proposition upon an incorrect predicate. The Council of National Defense did not take any action to treble the price of coal. The present price of coal is $5.50 and $6 a ton. The action which they took was to reduce it about 50 per cent, and they expressly stated that this was simply temporary. There may be a further reduction yet as the result of the action of Congress and the inquiry of the Federal Trade Commission. Congress may conclude to regard coal as a public utility and fix the price, as the charges for gas and water and electricity are fixed; but it is not done yet, and it will take time to consider the method of doing it, and we all know the uncertainties of legislation. Here were these prices soaring in the market under an extraordinary demand, likely to reach altitudes not yet reached, and produce a perfect demoralization of the entire industrial system and a demoralization of our wage system. What was there to be done in this period of contention but to declare a modus vivendi, something analogous to the modus vivendi in diplomacy, a plan for living whilst we are proceeding with deliberation and judgment to the ultimate solution of the question?

I think Secretary Lane acted patriotically, and I do not believe there is a word of exaggeration in any utterance he made when you view the results, for if the modus vivendi is adhered to not only increased prices in the future will be averted, but the existing prices will be diminished 50 per cent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course you may say that the action did not double the price of coal, if you are taking as your basis the extortions being practiced—extortions that are so bad that the evening paper, the Washington Times, states that—

President Wilson is insistent that the price of coal must be reduced. He made his position clear to Secretaries Daniels and Baker to-day. He regrets that any seeming differences of opinion should have arisen, but believes that, regardless of the misconceptions or misunderstandings, the effort from this day forward should be to bring down the exorbitant prices of coal.

But the prices were substantially doubled if we take the prices that prevailed only a few months ago, even since the war in Europe began. I repeat I do not think the Government is so powerless that it has to compromise with coal operators by giving them an increase of 100 per cent over normal prices. If I were a coal operator and could get that sort of a compromise, I would think I had won my case and gotten all that I could possibly obtain if I had gone on without any compromise. A "compromise" that gives a gentleman twice as much as he is entitled to can hardly be called a compromise.

So far as Secretary Lane is concerned, I did not criticize Secretary Lane. I simply call attention to the fact that every time I have read a fact here this afternoon somebody has said I am attacking somebody. You can look through all that I have said, and you will not find that I have attacked any official. I have used some rather strong language in regard to coal operators who enter into combinations for the purpose of plundering the people; but, Mr. President, I want to drive one fact home, if I can, this afternoon.

We are told that there are a lot of guardians of the public interest serving without pay as advisors of the Council of National Defense. We are given to understand that in their capacities, whatever those capacities may be, the purpose is to have them guard the interests of the Government and people of the United States. We are told, in substance and effect, that we are to have the benefit of their great intelligence and experience in order that our Government may be able to mobilize the industries of the people, the power of the land, control the entire economic situation, and be able in this way to present the most powerful front possible. Now, if these gentlemen are there acting in that capacity, I inquire why they do not begin by reforming themselves and their own business first. They do not need any authority of government to quit practicing extortion. They do not need any statute of the United States to authorize them to reduce the price of coal so that they will be selling at only 25 per cent advance over what they charged last year. They will be guilty of no crime if, instead of limiting the product, they shall continue to produce it in greater quantities; and if, acting each for himself, they reduce the price, surely they violate no law of God or of man.

Bearing in mind that they are put here as the special guardians of the American people, I want to know why this long list of coal operators did not themselves reduce the price; and if each had reduced the price upon the properties he controls, the effect in the markets of the United States undoubtedly would have been to bring the price down to something like a fair level.

At the head of this committee is F. S. Peabody, president of the Peabody Coal Co., of Chicago, as chairman; E. J. Berwind, president Berwind-White Coal Mining Co., of New York; W. W. Keefer, president Pittsburgh Terminal Railroad & Coal Co., Pittsburgh; Van. H. Manning, director of the United States Bureau of Mines, Washington (he is not a coal operator); C. M. Moderwell, president United Coal Mining Co., Chicago; E. L. Pierce, vice president Semet Solvey Co., Syracuse; Erskine Ramsey, vice president Pratt Consolidated Coal Co., Birmingham; and a large number of others. Whether they are all in the coal business I can not say, but it is presumed that they all or nearly all are.

I inquire now, if these gentlemen are put in the position they hold for the purpose of protecting the people of the United States and are to serve a useful end why they themselves have not reduced the price of coal in their own mines, in their own places of business that they do control?

I do not say that Secretary Lane did anything wicked or wrong when he tried to get these gentlemen to reduce prices, but I do say if he made an agreement at $3, intending to give that agreement the sanction of the Government and to put the power of the Government behind it, then he made a mistake, and a very serious mistake. What does that mean? It means, in the first place, that all the people of the country, speaking by and large, will have to pay nearly twice as much for their coal as they paid last year if they use bituminous coal, and that is the poor man's coal. It means that the great factories of our country will be obliged to employ coal at a very largely increased price. What is to become of the institution that has made a contract to furnish its product at a certain price and suddenly finds that the price of its fuel has been doubled, and that doubling has been sanctioned by the authority of the Government or by the authority of great Government officials?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does not the Senator think the manufacturers who are now paying $5.50 a ton for their coal, with the prospect of its running to $6, $7, or $8 a ton, will view with great satisfaction not a doubling of the present price but a halving of the present price?

Mr. REED. I am talking about the doubling of the price as it existed about two months ago, and I answer the Senator's question fairly, of course. If the present manufacturer found himself helpless, if as a matter of fact the coal combination is in operation to such an extent that he can not break it, then he would regard a movement reducing the price to $3 a ton as a very beneficent thing. But what I say is this: The Senator from Iowa furnishes me with facts from which I can make the assertion that the cost of the production of coal in the United States has only advanced a small amount, that the capacity of production of coal in the United States is as great as it ever was, and greater, says the Senator from Iowa; that this coal is produced in almost every State in the Union in vast quantities and from a multitude of mines, and there is no natural condition that will put the price up to $6 a ton or $5.50 a ton, or any similar price.

If you find that the price of an article that is produced universally has gone up to such exorbitant figures, you have the right to assume that there is a combination among those who produce it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If that is not the case, if it is true that we are absolutely in the grip of the coal dealers and producers of the country, and they are so strong that they can charge us $5.50 a ton, and the best compromise we can get is twice the price they charged last year, then I am of opinion that the Government will have to find some means to reach that difficulty and to relieve the people from it. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am only interested at this moment in keeping the record straight, and here the argument must be based upon what I understand to be the fact. It is immaterial to me whether the facts bear for or against the coal operators' interests The truth is that at least 80 per cent of the coal produced in the United States is produced under contracts entered into before the production takes place. These contracts are made usually on the 1st of April for a period of one or two years, as the case may be. It is not true that the coal operators get for the coal that they produce under contract any such sum as has been indicated. I venture to say that the testimony before our committee establishes the fact that the coal operators are now selling their contract coal at various prices from $1.75 a ton to $2.87 a ton. I do not remember that any of the contract coal so far as developed in our committee bore a higher price than $2.87 a ton. The contract purchasers are the railroads——

Mr. REED. That has all been gone over, if the Senator please. It has all been put in the record here.

Mr. CUMMINS. To the railroads, the big industries, and the jobbers who buy coal, but in turn sell it to the consumers, the operators have agreed to sell their coal in the main at less than $3. But those who have made contracts with them are selling their coal to the people who have not made contracts with them at any price they can get.

Mr. REED. Of course the Senator knows when the producers agree to sell coal at a contract price they have agreed to nothing; they have to do that anyway or pay the damages.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true. I only want it to be perfectly clear that accepting $3 a ton has not resulted in reducing the price of any very great quantity of the coal which the operators are now mining and selling. Certainly it does not apply to more than 20 per cent of it, and I doubt whether it applies to that amount, although I hope that it will result in some good to the consumer. On the other hand, I want the Senator from Missouri to know that I agree with him in this, that when we come to fix a price for a commodity like this, no matter where we get our information upon which to fix it, it ought to be fixed so that the producers would have a fair profit. But it is not tolerable to think that those who are to be benefited by the operation, those who are to sell it, should establish the price. The Government, if it interferes at all, ought to interfere from an entirely impartial, unprejudiced, and disinterested standpoint; and that is the amendment that I intend to offer to the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa has concluded, will the eminent Senator from Missouri allow me to intrude this thought? I have been informed, and in justice to Secretary Lane I make the statement, knowing the Senator from Missouri who holds the floor not only would not do injustice to anyone but he would correct an injustice quickly when done anyone.

It appears that the statement made by the coal operators at the gathering at which Secretary Lane addressed them took on, among other characters, a statement as to what was necessary to pay the men under some new arrangement with the miners' union, of which I can not tell the Senator in detail, and that upon that new basis, according to the new arrangement, coupled with what they must pay for transportation, the $3 suggested gave a very small margin to them for profit, against which they complained. It was then that Secretary Lane made the speech that they owed it to patriotism not to allow their children hereafter to be pointed to as the children of men who had gouged the Republic at a time of peril. Then it was they agreed on the $3 basis. I understand and state to the Senator what they represented to Secretary Lane was what would be their liability to the miners and the transportation.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. I am much obliged to the Senator from Illinois, although I declare I have said nothing whatever about Secretary Lane except to read his speech. I do not know why anybody should get exercised because I read it. I think I read it very well.

Mr. President, I want to bring the Senate back to the question I started to discuss some hours ago, which is the amendment I offered to include the words "aluminum and its products" in the bill. I have shown, I think, conclusively that aluminum is controlled by one concern; it is absolutely essential to the progress of the war, and I think it ought to be in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Let me say that might disclose the fact that there is not a quorum. Let us have a viva voce vote and save trouble. I withdraw the demand that I made, with the consent of the Senate, for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Missouri withdraws the request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to have the amendment to the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee, on page 2, lines 1 and 2, by inserting after the words "copper and its products" the words "aluminum and its products."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. KING. I had intended to move as an amendment to this section the striking out of the words "copper and its products" and the word "lead," but in view of the temper of the Senate, as demonstrated in the vote heretofore in respect to wool, hides, and cotton, I shall pretermit making that motion for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Jones, Wash.	Newlands	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Norris	Swanson
Cummins	Kenyon	Overman	Thomas
Curtis	King	Phelan	Thompson
Fernald	Knox	Poindexter	Trammell
France	Lewis	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Hale	McKellar	Reed	Warren
Hollis	Martin	Sheppard	Wolcott
Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smoot
Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Sterling

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on official business.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce the temporary absence on important business of my colleague, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who is detained on important business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask that the names of absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. KIRBY and Mr. MCNARY answered to their names when called.

Mr. GERRY, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. BROUSSARD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the absent Senators to appear in the Chamber.

Mr. LEWIS. In this connection, I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that in the room of the Committee on Finance there are a number of Senators engaged in the business of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I repeat my motion, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. PENROSE, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. LODGE, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. COLT, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. BECKHAM, and Mr. BRANDEGEE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is on the adoption of the committee amendment to section 1 as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "fuel," on line 8, page 1, down to and including the word "fertilizers," on line 4, page 2, and adding the word "and," after the word "therefor," on line 8, page 1, so that it will read:

That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense for the successful prosecution of the war and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, and containers therefor, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, or manipulations affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word in connection with this amendment. The title of the bill is "To provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel."

Mr. President, if the items that are now in the bill remain, there can not help but be a conflict of authority in the different appointments that have been made by the President of the United States for carrying out this very work. For instance, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, and lead are included in this bill, and yet there has been appointed a chairman for the purchase of raw materials, minerals, and metals in the person of Hon. Barney M. Baruch. We may take the other items included in the amendment and we find that this bill confers upon the person whom the President shall appoint authority to execute the provisions of the bill, while there have already been appointed certain individuals by the President of the United States to execute the small class of work. It therefore seems to me, Mr. President, that to make this bill what it was intended in the first place we should confine it to foods, feeds, and fuel.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, is not the Senator's real purpose to execute an idea he has to omit from this bill copper mines and their product, feeling that they are not cognate to the subject or purpose of the bill? Is not that the real purpose of the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that, but I would omit hemp, jute, sisal and their products, lead, timber, lumber, farm implements and machinery, cotton and wool, and skins and hides. In other words, I would allow this bill to provide the authority asked for by the President of the United States as it was introduced in the House and passed by that body. I would go no further; and then if Congress in its wisdom should desire to place these other industries of the country under Government control let it be done in the proper way and at the proper time.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the Senator, is not the Senator's real purpose, however, to eliminate from the bill the particular industry, the copper-mining industry, because he feels that it should be considered, having a knowledge of the subject, as not involved in this bill? Is not that the Senator's real purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. No; no more than as to any other industry or commodity that is mentioned in the bill. I will say, however, that I have in view eliminating the copper products of the country. There is no doubt about that, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, and I have no doubt that the gentleman who has been appointed by the President to look after this particular industry will do so, and with just as much benefit to the Government of the United States as any man that the President could appoint to carry out the provisions of the bill, if that industry were included in the pending measure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator proposes to leave out the words which were in the original House bill and in the Senate bill also, namely, after the word "fuel," the words "and articles required for their production."

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, that those words shall remain in the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Those words were in the bill, but the committee endeavoring to carry out the purposes that Senators have expressed in the arguments which have been made here, itemized these commodities.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand why the committee made the change; but I can not see any wisdom in enumerating the articles which are mentioned in the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. If the bill is enacted in the manner in which I propose to amend it, it will give all the power necessary to "assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, containers therefor, and fuel."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The motion of the Senator from Utah may have merit, but the reason he gives for it, it seems to me, is hardly sufficient. It is that Mr. Barney Baruch has been given authority by the President to make purchases of metals and other commodities of that kind; but the Senator from Utah will remember that the advisory commission, of which Mr. Baruch is one, deals only with purchases by the Government for the Army, the Navy, and other forces of the United States. If I understand this bill, it is intended not to fix prices for the Government alone, but for all the people, and I assume that Mr. Barney Baruch will not attempt to fix prices in the general commerce of the country and for private enterprise.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I understand that whatever price is fixed for the purchase of copper and other commodities necessary for the conduct of the war by the Government of the United States will also apply to all of our allies. I understand also that our allies have virtually agreed that there shall be one purchasing agency in this country, and that that agency shall purchase not only supplies for our own Government but they shall purchase supplies for the allies as well, and at the same price.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah does not understand me. I am referring to the fact that this bill is intended, if I understand it, to regulate the prices of these commodities in the general commerce of the country, as well for private purchasers as for public purchasers. The Senator does not claim, I assume, that the advisory commission undertakes to fix prices generally throughout the United States for all commercial and industrial purposes?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I do not think it could do that under the law; but I do believe that whatever price is fixed by the Government of the United States and our allies will be the price that will be established by the United States for all who purchase commodities such as those mentioned in this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator think that would be true of wheat and corn?

Mr. SMOOT. I believe that the price of wheat and corn will be agreed upon as to what shall be paid for them, and that price will be the price paid by our Government, our allies, and neutral countries.

Mr. CUMMINS. Who shall pay?

Mr. SMOOT. The Government of the United States shall pay.

Mr. CUMMINS. For feeding its Army and its Navy?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and for whatever——

Mr. CUMMINS. But for your purposes and mine does the Senator mean that this advisory commission is expected to fix the prices that he and I shall pay?

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, that the price fixed for wheat for the Army and the Navy of the United States, for our allies and neutral countries—and I understand that will be the policy—will be the price established in the United States. That is what I believe.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the head of the particular branch of the advisory commission, of which the Senator speaks, gathers together all the great dealers in a particular product that the Government might want and, after getting them all together, arranges a price with them; in other words, he merely arranges the best price that he can get with those gentlemen, and that is the extent of his power and authority. But under the terms of this bill I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the situation would be very different.

Whoever has charge of this particular business under this bill will have the right to call those gentlemen together and say to them that if they do not sell to the Government at a reasonable price the Government will have a right to commandeer the commodity; and it makes all the difference in the world as to the kind of price for which they will get the product.

Mr. SMOOT. Everyone knows that whoever controls the surplus of any product controls the price of that product. That is a law of trade that is just as sure as life and death.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that is so—if the Senator will permit me again—unless the Government, as the case may be, would have the right to commandeer the commodity and fix the price for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the price is fixed upon the surplus, whether that is a reasonable or an unreasonable price, that will be what that product will bring in the market and no more, and I was going to say no less. Therefore it seems to me that this whole proposition will be controlled by whoever is appointed to fix the price for the purchase of commodities for our Government, our allies, and neutral countries, or, in the case of wheat, for the Army of the United States, for our allies, and for the neutral countries of the world.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, how does it happen that the Government buys coal at one price and private consumers pay another?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, no plan of action has yet been consummated as to just what the public shall pay for coal. We see from the papers what the suggested price was to be, but that has not yet been definitely determined. But if the Government of the United States, or if Mr. Howard E. Coffin, we will say, as chairman of one of the divisions of the advisory commission, should fix the price at which the Government of the United States should purchase its coal, and he should also fix the price at which the coal should be sold to all other countries of the world, I have no doubt at all but that the price fixed by him at the time, and agreed to under normal conditions, would be the universal price in the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah forgets that we are buying coal all the time and paying a certain price for it; we are exporting coal all the time and receiving a certain price for it; and yet the prices paid by the consumers generally throughout the country bear no relation whatever to either the price paid by the Government or the export price.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say to the Senator, in that connection, that the reason of that is that until within a short time there has been sufficient coal to meet all the demand, and not only all the demand, but, if necessary, to meet additional demands.

Mr. CUMMINS. That has not been true for at least a year, although that may have been true at a former time. Now, the Senator from Utah invokes a rule of economy which is perfectly well known and is absolutely sound provided there is no interference with it on the part of the Government; but the Government, by its action, can destroy that rule just as effectually as it can destroy any others.

I do not agree with the Senator that if the price of the coal consumed by the Government or consumed by our allies is fixed, thereupon the price of all coal for domestic consumption is at the same time fixed. I do not agree that that would be true of any other product; and it seemed to me that the amendment of the Senator proceeded upon the theory that we were attempting to fix only the price of commodities purchased or taken for public use, if I may use that phrase, as distinguished from an attempt to fix prices generally throughout the United States on a variety of commodities, because the general law of supply and demand has broken down.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the request that was made to Congress for legislation of this character included only foods, feeds, and fuels, and I think that is exactly where we ought to stop in this bill. Of course, if there were no surplus of any products in the United States, exactly what the Senator says would be absolutely true in relation to trade; but I want to say now that I believe that it is absolutely impossible for the Government of the United States to undertake, through any agency, within the limited time of this war, to control the price of every product of the United States—control its production, control its distribution, and control the transportation of the same. I think it would have the effect, if undertaken, of breaking down the business of the country and at a time when it is necessary to enlarge production instead of limiting or decreasing it. Legislation of this kind is supposed to encourage the production not only of grain and foodstuffs and fuels of all kinds but of everything else that is required in the prosecution of the war. Legislation of this kind will have a tendency not to increase the production but to decrease it, and that is exactly what the people of the United States will disapprove of at this particular time, and it would be a very disastrous thing for our Government if it should happen.

Therefore I made the motion as I did, believing that that was what ought to be done in this bill. If there are reasons why the other commodities should be regulated in a similar way, then let us have a bill covering those particular commodities. I just came from a meeting of the Finance Committee and take it for granted that the committee amendment has been adopted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not see how he can entertain the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. It is only a motion in the second degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the first place, the Senator moves to strike out words that are not in the bill. The committee's amendment is no part of the bill. It has not been agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is agreed to, then I will have to ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which it is agreed to, and that I do not want to do. I want to strike it out before it is adopted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I was going to make the point of order——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Words that are not in the bill can not be stricken out.

In the second place, the Senator moves to strike out a pending amendment of the committee. Such a motion is not in order. The same purpose desired by the Senator from Utah can be accomplished in a parliamentary way that the Chair, of course, need not suggest to the Senator. The Chair believes that a motion to strike out the exact words embraced in an amendment is not in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will withhold the motion until we have a vote on this matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask that the committee amendment as now amended be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as amended.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposed, beginning on page 1, line 8, after the word "fuel," to strike out the words "and articles required for their production" and insert "including petroleum and its products, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, aluminum and its products, hides, skins, hemp, jute, cotton, wool, and sisal and their products, lead, timber, lumber, or the joint product or products of two or more of the said materials, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers and fertilizer ingredients."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it is apparent that little, if anything, has been forgotten. Perhaps some one might have asked that Portland cement be included, but I shall not suggest it seriously at this point.

Mr. President, this is no longer a food-control bill; that is, if we pay attention to the additional products which are brought within its jurisdiction and compare them to the value of the products raised upon the farm. I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that no government on earth can exercise the powers which this bill seeks to confer upon it if this amendment is adopted and taken in conjunction with that section of the bill which provides for the licensing, in the discretion of the President, of every person, corporation, or concern that is engaged in the production, distribution, or marketing of any of these products.

I had hoped, and have hoped from the beginning, that whatever legislation we should enact at this session on the question of the food supply and its control should be restricted to the actual food supply and its control; and my understanding is that the administration, which presumably knows what is necessary for the successful conduct of this war, has not asked anything more than that. I have been consistent in my attitude, for I voted in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry against the inclusion in the bill of this long catalogue of articles produced in the United States, which, taken in the aggregate, include practically all the business done by the people.

For that reason I hope that the committee amendment as amended will not be adopted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator says that he does not understand that the administration asked for control over anything but foods, fuel, and feeds. I did not have the pleasure of attending the sessions of the committee when Mr. Hoover gave his views to the committee. Did he express any opinion about these other additions which we are now considering?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have not attended all the meetings—or, if I may use the term, conferences—at which Mr. Hoover was present. In my presence neither he nor any other representative of the administration has indicated any desire to have any control over lead or steel or iron or timber or lumber or cotton or wool, or several other things mentioned in the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I mean, the question was not asked him then whether it would be wise to include these things or not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not in my presence.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before this amendment is voted upon I want to say, simply in explanation of the vote I shall cast, that if I were permitted to frame a bill which, according to my view, would best meet the situation, I would confine it to wheat and coal, and I would make the Government the purchaser of all the wheat produced for a given time, paying the farmer a fair profit upon it, and selling it to the consumer at a fair average price. I would do the same thing respecting coal. I would have the Government become the owner of the coal at the mouth of the mine, paying the producer the cost of production and a fair profit, just as I would the farmer; and I would then have the Government direct the distribution and the price at which the commodity should be sold in various parts of the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. I am simply explaining my vote.

If, however, we are to pursue the course suggested in this bill—that is, attempt to regulate these matters through the licensing system and through the minimum-price system, both of which are parts of the bill—then to me, at least, it is indispensable that every other important product in the industry of the country shall be also controlled in the bill.

I can not conceive how the system that is provided for in the bill can be fairly and equitably administered without including within its provisions practically everything that tends to make up the industrial life of the country.

Moved by these considerations, and these alone, I shall feel constrained to vote for the amendment as proposed by the committee; while if another system could prevail, which I intend to present after a while if I ever have an opportunity, I should be very glad to see the functions of the Government at the present time limited to the two things I have suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. PENROSE. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I announce the same pair and transfer as heretofore and vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I understand he has not voted. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—42.

Beckham	Hale	Lewis	Shields
Borah	Hollis	Martin	Simmons
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Newlands	Swanson

Gronna	McNary	Smith, Ariz.

So the amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator in charge of the bill wish to have the Senate continue longer in session to-night?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that I would like very much to finish section 1. We have been on it for three or four days now, and I hope the Senate will remain in session until we get rid of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest to the Senator that we take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That would be perfectly satisfactory to me, but I would not like to impose on Senators by asking them to come here at 8 o'clock. I think we can dispose of this section shortly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me that we are not making very much progress and that we should get along faster than we have been doing with the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to Senators I am perfectly willing to work here all night, so far as I am concerned, but my experience in the Senate is that unless notice is given in advance that there is going to be a night session we can not maintain a quorum. That is the only reason for not desiring to work to-night. I will say to Senators that if the bill hangs much longer in the Senate I shall ask the Senate to remain in session at night until it is disposed of, but I do not think it would be fair to the Senate without notice to ask it to-day at least to come here to-night. However, I will ask it if we do not reach somewhere near the end of it in the very near future; and I am going to suggest now that to-morrow I shall present an application or motion signed by the required number of Senators to have a cloture rule applied in due course.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply want to suggest that I think it would hardly be proper to try to enforce the cloture rule until we have made a little more earnest effort to get the bill passed in the regular way. We are going along here and have not even voted on the first section yet. It seems to me we ought to use the ordinary methods and get down to business in connection with the amendments, and try to get the bill through in that way before trying to adopt any cloture rule. We ought to run extra hours and see if we can not make more progress that way.

I want to see the bill passed; I am ready to vote upon it at any time; I should like to see a night session to get along with it; but I would not like to see the Senator bring in a cloture rule before we have considered or even voted upon a single section.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say that we have been following the ordinary rule for two weeks, and, as the Senator says, we have not yet gotten through with the first section. If the Senator will suggest that we ought to go ahead and hold a night session and start in to-morrow night, I shall be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to have it done.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will be glad to see that. I would be glad to see a night session to-night.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then I will request that to-morrow night the Senate shall remain in session.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And remain in session on the Fourth of July, too.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, as I understand the cloture rule, and I was on the committee of conference which drafted the rule, it is to kill a filibuster, but it was never contemplated that the rule should be invoked to throttle legitimate legislation.

The delay in the bill is largely due to the ill-advised efforts of certain Members of this body to put a drastic prohibition provision in the bill, and it is their fault in ranging all over the universe and putting different subjects in it that have no business in the bill that is causing the delay.

I do not think that any Senator has yet been guilty of a deliberate attempt to filibuster or delay the measure, and it will be a bad day for the Senate and for the country when the cloture rule is invoked to kill off legitimate and illuminating debates.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that there is not anything in the RECORD or proceedings in connection with the consideration of this bill to show that any of the friends of the temperance provision have been trying to delay its passage. On the contrary, they have not consumed a single moment of the time of the Senate.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, it is the Senators who are opposed to prohibition who have been filibustering against the bill, if any filibustering has been done. They are the Senators who have threatened, at any rate, to filibuster against the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In just a moment I will yield. There has been a studious attempt not only upon the part of Senators upon this floor but upon the part of newspapers of the country to impress the country with the fact that this prohibition proposition has been brought in here by the friends of prohibition and that Senators who are in favor of it are the Senators who are delaying the passage of the bill.

Mr. President, that impression is absolutely baseless. It is contrary to the fact. The prohibition section was in the bill when it was introduced. It was in it as prepared by the administration. It represented the views of the President himself, or it would not have been in the bill. It was in the bill when it was introduced in the House. Not only the question of regulation, not only the question of limitation upon the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of liquors, but the prohibition of their manufacture was left to the President, and it was put there at the express desire of the President. The administration brought it to Congress, and not the friends of prohibition. So, Mr. President, they are not to blame for the situation.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to intimate that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, who have, day in and day out, been fighting this bill, talking upon it and proposing amendments after amendments, have been doing so because of their opposition to the temperance provision in the bill, then, indeed, he is welcome to make the suggestion; but they are not the Senators who are in favor of conserving the food supplies of the country in a real, genuine, practical way by saving them as food for our own people and our own boys at the front and our allies, instead of using them for weakening our armies and destroying our industries and bringing us to the very verge of ruin, as it has brought the nations across the water.

Mr. President, I resent the suggestion made on this floor that the friends of temperance have been delaying the passage of this bill. They have not only not been delaying it but they have not desired to delay it. They have been ready for a vote at any time. They would vote upon the proposition in which they are interested without any protracted debate. They would vote upon it without any debate at all in order to get the bill through.

When the President of the United States appealed to gentlemen outside of this Chamber who are interested in this provision, not as a prohibition measure, not as a temperance measure, but as a food-conservation measure, and appealed to them as patriots not to urge the provision, why did he not go to the brewers of the country that have been filling this Capitol with their lobbies and their representatives and ask them in the name of patriotism to permit the food of the country to be preserved, ask them to withdraw their opposition, and ask them to appeal to Senators not to filibuster against the bill but to allow it to pass, as patriots, for the conservation of the food supply of the country? Why did he not do that? Because he knew they had no patriotism but their own selfish ends. He went to men whom he knew to be patriotic and unselfish and they responded patriotically.

Mr. President, there seems to have been a determined attempt by the great metropolitan press to misrepresent the attitude of the friends of prohibition. We have not been for these provisions because of prohibition. Our friends have been for these provisions because they consider them conservation measures of a real, genuine, practical kind. They have been for these provisions in order to assist this country in winning the war. They are for them because they believe there is no influence in this country that is more weakening upon the strength and efficiency of our people and of our armies than the liquor traffic. They believe in them because it has been shown that one of the greatest enemies that England, France, and Italy have been fighting is the liquor traffic, that it has weakened their forces more than the guns and batteries of Germany.

Mr. President, we are fighting not on behalf of temperance but on behalf of conservation, on behalf of making more efficient our Army and our industries. Mr. President, we have said to our boys in uniform you can not have beer, you can not have liquor. We have taken it away from them, and we have passed a law of that character under a penalty that no man can sell to them intoxicating liquors.

We believe, Mr. President, that what is good for the boys at the front is good for the boys at home, for whose liberty and whose Government these men are fighting, and if we are going to insist that this denial shall be forced upon them we believe that we should also say to our people back at home, you can not have these things that destroy your efficiency, that make you less able to uphold and strengthen the arms of the boys at the front.

So, Mr. President, there is no foundation for the charge that Senators on this floor who are favorable to temperance have been delaying this bill. They have not done it. It is only those Senators who are opposed, if you please, to the provisions regarding temperance who have insisted and are insisting now, and who have threatened that the bill shall not pass for weeks and weeks, that it shall not pass this summer, if these provisions in the interest of our Government and in the interest of victory in this war shall be pressed.

I say this, Mr. President, in the hope that the country may know that these statements given out on this floor, reiterated in the great press of the country, that seems to be somehow owned, controlled, and dominated by the liquor interests as they have appeared in the past to be owned, controlled, and dominated by the munition interests of the country, have been misrepresenting the situation in order to deceive the people. Why Senators should make these statements I can not conceive, but the people will have their opinion.

Mr. President, we are ready to vote on this proposition at any time, at any moment. We are ready to vote now if you can get the various propositions in shape to vote upon them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there seems to be no real difference between the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. It sounds as though there was a difference, but there really is none. It is all in the sound. The Senator from Pennsylvania denied that there had been any filibuster or undue delay, and then covertly intimated that there had been, but that the prohibitionists had caused it. Then the Senator from Washington arises and denies that there has been any filibustering or delay, and not only covertly intimates but loudly acclaims that it has all been due to the antiprohibitionists. Thus both agree, first, that there has been undue delay, and, secondly, that the other caused it. The truth is they are both telling the truth.

Let us be frank and honest with one another and with the people. Let the divergent wings, with neither of which I have too much sympathy, be frank and honest with each other. One side wanted to wait until it saw it had the situation so that it could pass the bill in its way, and the other side wanted to wait until it thought it had the situation so that it could pass it in its way. That is about the God's truth of it.

Now, moreover, Senators do not so much differ even upon the conservation of food question. The Senator from Pennsylvania is perfectly willing to put such an extreme tax or in some other constitutional way to pass such legislation as shall prevent the use of foodstuffs for distillation purposes—foodstuffs, grains, cereals—but he wants to leave hops and malt and barley entering into beer and he wants to leave grapes entering into wine free. The Senator from Washington meets him half way, and more than half way, by wanting to do the same thing with regard to the use of grain and human food for distillation purposes, but also wants to forbid the use of hops and barley to make beer and grapes to make wine.

If the sole object were conservation of food for the purpose of feeding armies and navies, they are together upon nearly every point at issue. The balance of it is a mere discussion or a general discussion as to whether or not—and it has nothing to do with this bill; it has nothing to do with the conservation of grain fit for human consumption, but it is a moral question—whether beer is as dangerous to humanity as is whisky and whether light wines are as dangerous to humanity as is whisky. I hope Senators will not go into a side debate concerning things that they do not really differ about. I hope that we may get a vote upon this bill.

Now, I want to say one more word, Mr. President, and I shall have finished.

I have very little patience with the man on either side of these side-issue controversies who concerns himself more about the possible abuse of an authority conferred by the Congress of the United States upon the Executive of the United States, which Executive may be absolutely removed every four years, than he is concerned about whether or not we shall win in this world conflict. If we lose, we lose nearly everything that is worth man's living for; whether we lose it definitely and finally or not, we shall be forced to keep it in abeyance; we shall be forced to keep ourselves in a state of armed preparedness, for fear the day may come when we shall lose it all. If we win the war, we win nearly everything that is welcome to lovers of liberty and Americanism. Now, for Heaven's sake, let us not quarrel about these little things. Settle the matter in one way or another.

Let there be an end to controversy. It is a side issue, a minor issue after all. Conserve your human foodstuffs—it ought to be done; it would be a shame if we did not do it—by preventing their use for distillation purposes. Do not let corn and rye and wheat and molasses, and things that ought to go into the stomachs of suffering people all over the world, and especially of the armed forces engaged in this conflict, be turned aside from the human stomach and turned into whisky and rum.

The other question is a minor one, as far as the war emergency goes. There is no great conservation of food connected with the question of preventing barley and hops from being used in the manufacture of beer. So if the gentlemen be sincere and honest about what they say, and if this be as the Senator from Washington says, not a temperance question, not a prohibition question, but merely a question of conservation of food, then the conservation of food from the use of barley and hops and malt in making beer is almost an infinitesimal question, it is insignificant, and hardly worth considering.

If, of course, upon the other hand, the gentlemen are going to make a prohibition and antiprohibition question of it, then the whole thing is worthy of spending a great deal of time over; but if you regard it as a side issue and as a minor consideration, except as to the conservation of food fit for human beings, then the two Senators from Pennsylvania and Washington and their followers are both upon the same basis, and both substantially agree right now.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I think the minds of Senators are made up on this question, and in order to get it out of the way, I ask unanimous consent that at 1 o'clock to-morrow, without debate, we vote, as in Committee of the Whole, on the section relating to alcoholic liquors and all amendments relating thereto.

Mr. PENROSE. I object.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I request that a vote be had on the remainder of section 1. I think that we can dispose of that in a few minutes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say just a word. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has retired from the Chamber. He seems to think that whenever he makes a statement that must settle it and there is no room for further controversy. He says that this matter of the conservation of foodstuffs and beer is a very minor matter. It may appear so to him, Mr. President; but I do not intend to go into a discussion with reference to details. I think, however, that we can show by reliable figures and by very reliable statements from very reliable men that the great conservation of foodstuffs will come from the stopping of the manufacture of beer, much more than from distilled liquors. There are two or three hundred million gallons of distilled spirits, that will last probably for two or three years, which have already been manufactured. To stop the further distillation would not very much conserve foodstuffs and would not very much promote the cause of temperance.

I am not going into a discussion of the details of the matter at this time, but I may do so later if those opposed to these provisions continue to discuss and delay the bill. I am very sorry, indeed, that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] would not consent to a vote upon the proposition to-morrow, as suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in section 1, page 2, line 6, after the word "speculation," to insert "or"; in the same line, after the word "manipulations," to strike out "and private controls"; and, in line 9, after the word "war," to strike out "For such purposes the instrumentalities, means, methods, powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are created, established, conferred, and prescribed," so as to read:

To prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, or manipulations affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war.

The amendment was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., Monday, July 2, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 3, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 3, 1917.

(Legislative day of Thursday, June 28, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMERENE. I have received a large number of telegrams in the nature of memorials from manufacturers, merchants, and professional men of my State, remonstrating against national prohibition and stating their reasons therefor, which I ask to have noted in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Dorset, Vt., and a petition of the annual convention of the Windham County Convention of Christian Endeavors, held at Brattleboro, Vt., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I present resolutions adopted at a preachers' meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Baltimore, Md., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BALTIMORE, MD., July 2, 1917.

HON. JOHN WALTER SMITH,
Senator from Maryland, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The preachers' meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Baltimore instructed me this morning to forward to you the inclosed copy of their action and we request you to consider it an appeal to yourself and to present it as their petition to the Senate.

I remain, dear sir,
Yours, truly,

REV. CHARLES W. BALDWIN,
President Preachers' Meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Baltimore.

Whereas Mr. Hoover, adviser to the President, in a letter lately sent to ministers of the Gospel appealed to them that as leaders of the people they, on July 1, urge upon the women of their congregations the duty of food conservation; and

Whereas the House of Representatives has passed a bill prohibiting for the war time the use of any foodstuffs for the production of alcoholic beverages; and

Whereas Mr. Hoover in his aforesaid letter stated that our crop prospects are such that after our own needs shall have been supplied and the surplus shipped to our allies there will be 300,000,000 bushels of wheat yet needed for their proper sustenance: Therefore Resolved by the preachers meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Baltimore, That we have cheerfully complied with the request of the President and Mr. Hoover, and that we are sure that the women of our country will effectively respond to this call, but, we respectfully and emphatically protest that it is unfair to the women to put this burden upon them so long as the men of our Nation and the purveyors of intoxicating drinks waste billions of money and millions of foodstuffs every year in intoxicating liquors.

Resolved, That we would deeply deplore refusal of the Senate to concur in the bill aforesaid passed by the House.

Resolved, That we respectfully petition the President and Mr. Herbert Hoover to use their influence to have the aforesaid bill adopted by the Senate and that we call upon the Hon. JOHN WALTER SMITH and the Hon. JOSEPH I. FRANCE, Senators from Maryland, to sustain said bill to the utmost of their abilities and to record their votes in its favor.

Resolved, That a copy of this paper be sent to the President, to Mr. Hoover, and to each of our Senators.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 2548) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from the Treasury a certain sum of the permanent fund of the Chippewas of Minnesota, now on deposit therein to their credit; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 2549) granting an increase of pension to Henry Janzen; to the Committee on Pensions.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4897) to amend section 10 of the national-defense act, approved June 3, 1916, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 4285), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

CLASSIFICATION OF AMERICAN POTATOES.

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 9), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 50,000 copies of Bulletin No. 176, entitled "Group classification and varietal description of American potatoes," issued by the Department of Agriculture, be printed for the use of that department.

ADDRESS OF DR. J. L. MAGNES.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by Dr. J. L. Magnes, of New York. I wish to say, Mr. President, that while I do not agree with all of his statements, the address is a very able one and is couched in parliamentary and beautiful language, and is not offensive in any way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address referred to is as follows:

CONFERENCE FOR DEMOCRACY AND TERMS OF PEACE.
[Garden Theater, New York City, May 30–31, 1917.]
OPENING ADDRESS BY DR. J. L. MAGNES, NEW YORK, CHAIRMAN.

We have come in the midst of war to aid the cause of peace. We have come from all parts of our loved country to rededicate ourselves to the cause of democracy and international brotherhood. We come here because we love America and because we want America to assume leadership in bringing about a speedy and universal and democratic peace such as will endure for a long time to come.

We have not come as obstructionists. We are aware of the gravity of the situation confronting our Government. We are eager to be of aid. We do not pretend to advise as to the conduct of the war—we have no talent for that. We do, however, think that we can be of aid in advising our Government and the people of America as to the necessity and the method of bringing about a speedy and universal and democratic peace.

We assume that our Government is anxious to hear what the citizens of this democracy have to say. The Secretary of the Navy said on May 25 that "the spirit of the administration is that comment and criticism are the very life of a democracy." In any event we should have regarded it as our duty as citizens of the American Republic to exercise our constitutional right of free speech, of peaceable assemblage, and of petition, and to express such views and to take such action as in this emergency we think best for America. We agree very seriously and literally with what our President said concerning the "privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience."

We urge upon the President and the Congress an immediate public statement of our war aims and our peace terms. Our young men are about to be drafted into military service and our soldiers are about to be sent across the seas. What, in concrete terms that every man can understand, are they to fight for, and upon what terms will America be ready to end the war and make peace? We urge further that when such concrete aims shall have been formulated, the President declare as a standing peace offer to Germany that whenever these specified aims shall have been achieved we are ready to end the war.

The President and Congress have said that we have gone to war because of Germany's illegal and brutal submarine warfare. Will we be ready to end the war and make peace if this ruthless submarine warfare be ended? This question should be answered clearly because as to it there is confusion in the minds of the public.

The President has said also that we have gone to war because "The world must be made safe for democracy." The American people—devoted to this lofty aim—have the right to know just what this means to the President. To make the entire world safe for democracy may take a very, very long time. What particular part of the world, then, do we refer to, and what degree of safety do we require, and what degree of democracy will satisfy us? Does a world made safe for democracy refer to Germany alone, or does it refer to Austro-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey as well, with whom we are not as yet at war? Does it also refer to some of our allies, Japan, for instance, and to some of the possessions held or dominated by our allies—Ireland, India, Morocco, Persia, for instance? If it refers to Germany alone, what are we after there? Is a military defeat of Germany absolutely essential before we shall agree to peace, so that Germany and all men may know that Germany's militarism is not invincible? And what will we exact of Germany if she be defeated? The President has said: "We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation." Do we then demand as a condition sine qua non of a world made safe for democracy the dethronement of the Kaiser, or the reform of the three-class Prussian electorial system, or a ministry responsible to the Reichstag instead of to the Kaiser? Or must Germany become a Republic, copied after our own? If we are to make Germany into a democracy, are we to dictate forms of economic as well as of political life, and is the degree of democracy to be determined by our own standards or by those of the freer democracy of the new Russia? The people of this country, who are to bear the burden of this war, have a right to know exactly what a world made safe for democracy means. They have a right to know exactly what it is that we want of Germany, just what we will be satisfied with, concretely and specifically what, if we achieve it, we shall stop fighting for. And it may be that if our Government says all of this clearly and unmistakably, the echo of it will reverberate in Germany, and to use the President's words, we may be "that much nearer a definite discussion of the peace which shall end the present war."

The new Russian minister of foreign affairs said last week: "There are two great new facts in the war—the Russian revolution and the entry of the great Republic of the United States." One of the things this conference on democracy and peace terms is aiming at is to suggest ways and means whereby these two forces may cooperate to bring about a speedy, general, and democratic peace.

The Russian Republic has announced its war aims and its peace terms. And our own conference is called together upon that very basis:

No forcible annexations.

No punitive indemnities.

Free development of all nations and peoples and nationalities.

Because of this eminently humane, just, clear-sighted policy the Russian Republic has been accused of all manner of unscrupulous and blundering subservience to German influence. It does not, however, require much knowledge of the Russian situation to understand the very simple and cogent reasons for the policy of the new and democratic Russia. Russia's revolutionary democracy is dominated by men and women who are the creators and heirs of a rare revolutionary tradition permeated with a deep love of humanity, liberty, justice. Is it not natural that such revolutionaries should be eager for an international peace, that they should not lust after the territory of others, that they should banish all thoughts of inflicting reprisals upon their enemies through punitive indemnities and contributions, and that they should demand the right of all nations to determine their own affairs? But, from a narrower point of view as well, it is easy to comprehend the reasons for the Russian peace terms. Russia wants above all things to save the new democracy and the new Republic. Any other peace terms would be a menace to the new Russia. These peace terms offer a possible basis of a speedy, general, democratic peace, and in order to be saved from reaction within and the enemy from without, Russia needs a world at peace and does not need new territories or indemnities. Russia needs the opportunity now to work out its overwhelming problems in peace. Or shall the suggestion, insidiously made in America, be adopted by Russia that "the best thing to do is to set up a dictatorship and to postpone all reforms until after the war"? If Russia suffers a military reverse, then, indeed, a military dictatorship with a snuffing out of the ardor of the new democracy will inevitably result. If, on the other hand, Russia can not, for whatever reasons, achieve this speedy, general, democratic peace, America must understand that the Russian armies will have the spirit to continue the war on one condition—that their own idealistic war aims be made the war aims of their allies.

For every eventuality, therefore, it is vital for Russia to have America's aid in imposing her own war aims upon all of the belligerents. Russia has asked for this aid. On May 4, when the new formulation of war aims was forced upon the then Provisional Government of Russia by the Council of Soldiers and Workmen's Delegates, Prince Tzeretelli, now a member of the Provisional Government, said: "Now that the question has been settled here our war aims—war without annexations, appropriations, or contributions—also must be realized abroad. We must know the attitude of the democracy of our allies. If a similar movement takes place in the foreign democracies, this will bring peace much nearer."

This Conference on Democracy and Terms of Peace is meeting to-day in an endeavor to bring about this movement in the democracy of America. We aim to let the Russian democracy know the attitude of the democracy of America. We believe in the Russian war aims and peace terms, because we think they are just and because their adoption by all the belligerents would "bring peace much nearer." If we understand the President aright, these are also the war aims and peace terms outlined by him, and it is our hope that he will now confirm this in the clear, precise, specific words of which he is master. We want the Russian democracy to know that in America there are vast numbers of American citizens who, even before the President has spoken, share the Russian war aims, and that we are no less eager than they to bring about a speedy, universal, and democratic peace. We want them to know that the American democracy does not intend to lag behind the Russian in the development of political and economic internationalism, and in all the constructive arts of peace. We want them to know that we would vie with them in working out new forms of freedom and of life.

In the course of this conference we shall tell more in detail what we mean by "no forcible annexations, no punitive indemnities, free development of all nations, peoples, and nationalities."

I think it important, however, briefly to say at the very outset that, in general, the formulation "no forcible annexations" means the restoration of Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, and of all other territories conquered by the one side or by the other. It means that all territorial readjustments must be secured through negotiations, and that in these negotiations the democratic method be applied, namely, that no territory shall be transferred from one sovereignty to another against the will of the people of that territory.

If the minority socialists of France can demand this method as to Alsace-Lorraine, if the socialists of both Serbia and Bulgaria can demand this method as to the Balkans, surely the democratic forces of America, which seeks no conquest or dominion, need not be more royal than the king, and should demand the application of this formula and this method to all the perplexing territorial and frontier adjustments which must no longer disturb the peace of the world.

The formulation "no punitive indemnities" means that however much one belligerent succeeds in crushing another, there shall be a peace without victory; that is, that the victor shall not punish the vanquished by expropriating territory or levying contributions as Germany did with France in 1870. This does not mean that the world shall be indifferent to the sufferings of ravished peoples or of devastated districts. It is perfectly consistent with the thought, as expressed by the Boston League for Democratic Control, of "an international assumption of the expense of reconstructing devastated areas in Europe, a large proportion to be borne by the United States in return for guaranties of future peace."

The formula "the free development of all nations" means that every nation, people, and nationality shall have the right to determine the conditions under which it is to develop its own life. It means that great nations shall not subjugate small nations; that subject and oppressed peoples and nationalities shall have the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Lloyd-George said on Sunday that "lasting peace will come when all the peoples of Europe are free to determine their own fate for themselves." The Russian formulation, which we make our own, means this, but more than this. It means guaranteeing the rights and liberties not only of the subject peoples and nationalities of the central powers but of the subject peoples and nationalities of the entente as well, and not only those of Europe, but also those of Asia and Africa and America and of the Seven Seas, whatever be their religion or their color. For it is only if the peoples of the world are freed politically, economically, spiritually, that the bases of a lasting peace can be laid. It is fatuous to suppose that any league can enforce a peace based merely upon power and not based upon the free will of all the liberated democracies of all of Europe, of all of Asia, of all of Africa, and of all the Americas.

Russia is now attempting to persuade her allies whole-heartedly to agree to this formulation of war aims, and we believe it to be the privilege and obligation of our Government to aid Russia in thus "bringing peace much nearer."

The obligation upon our Government is doubly serious because of the manner in which some of the belligerents have already reacted to the Russian proposals.

Unfortunately, the English reaction to the Russian formula has not thus far been encouraging. According to Lord Robert Cecil, the English must hold the captured German colonies, and, according to Mr. Asquith, there has been no change in the entente's war aims. What we ask is: Is American in the war to help England get Germany's colonies and to achieve the imperialistic ambitions of any of the belligerents? Or will America make common cause with Russia on the basis of no forcible annexations, and thus assure a peace without victory with the chance this gives for freedom and democracy and civilization the world over?

The Government of France has reacted to the Russian proposals by declaring through Premier Ribot that revanche must be satisfied and the "lost provinces" be returned. Everyone must admire the tenacity of France in its struggle to reconquer Alsace-Lorraine. But have we gone to war to help France get back her "lost provinces," and are we committed to the theory of restoring all provinces "lost" in the past 50 years? And is it our theory that these injustices can be cured by war? Rather than embark upon the complicated enterprise of restoring lost provinces, should not the policy of our Government look toward the support of the Russian policy of "no forcible annexations" without quibble and equivocation?

Another reason for our making common cause with Russia is because Austria, in the semiofficial Fremdenblatt, has declared her war aims to be identical with those of Russia.

And Germany! There are those who say that the Russian program for peace is a German program for peace. On what authority is this said? Would to Heaven that this were Germany's program for peace! Would to Heaven that Germany were ready to renounce her desire for annexations and indemnities! Unfortunately, this is not the German program for peace. The German Reichskanzler refused but a few days ago to declare this as the German peace program, despite the manifest advantages of doing so in answer to Russia. But though this is, alas, not the German program for peace, it ought to be made so. And it can be made so by America, not through war, but if America will back Russia's declared war aims, and if America will persuade—as she has the power to persuade—the English and the French to make these war aims their war aims as well. For consider well what was said in the German Reichstag on May 15. This was said: "If France and Great Britain renounce annexation and Germany insists thereon, there will be a revolution in Germany." In other words, if America and Russia, as the new factors in the war, will exercise leadership, if America will back Russia, if America will exert its vast power over England and France and insist upon the adoption of the Russian program, no one can doubt that the German people will rise up in their might and compel the German Government and the German junkers and capitalists to renounce all their hopes of annexations and indemnities, and peace will result.

To be sure, the mere suggestion of peace is regarded as traitorous in many quarters. The word peace is become the most terrifying in the language. But we are undaunted in our cry and in our passion for peace, because we know how futile all wars are, this one among them.

On April 24, but a short while after the Russian revolution had broken out, A. F. Kerensky, now Russian minister of the army and marine, said: "The Russian masses, whom I represent in the Provisional Government, recently established, indorse President Wilson's war aims, provided the President was speaking not as a diplomat but as the mouthpiece of the American people, when, in his peace note, he proclaimed a desire for peace without victory, and a reestablishment of European Governments along lines of racial development, the world will find the Russian soldiers, Russian sailors, and Russian workmen lined up solidly behind him in his desire to free the German people."

We turn to our President and we adjure him to speak as the mouthpiece of the American people, to reaffirm his belief in a peace without victory, and unequivocally to throw in the lot of the American democracy with that of Russia, and bring a speedy, universal, democratic peace to the world.

In any event we shall not cease lamenting the fact that the President found it necessary to urge war in order to achieve his peace aims. Alas, that America, the one haven of refuge for the oppressed and the suffering of all the world, America that might have acted as a harbinger of peace, bringing healing to the afflicted nations, is now bloody with war. On January 22, 1917, our President was still pursuing the method of negotiation, of neutrality, of moral force. Alas, that the suspense could no longer be borne; that the moral and intellectual strain grew too heavy; that patience was exhausted; and the plunge was taken into the abyss of war and death and brute physical force. But the fact that we are at war can not make us abhor war the less. The fact that we are at war makes us but the more determined to loathe it, to teach our children to loathe it, to want to make America and all the world loathe it. In the face of death we stand ready to exalt life. With destruction before us, we express our passionate devotion to the constructive processes of religion, literature, science, art. With suppression threatening us, we speak up for liberty, for freedom, for democracy. Not only have we a rooted and ineradicable repugnance to brute material force but we are also thoroughly convinced of the madness, the inadequacy, the impracticability of the war method to achieve the world peace so touchingly and fervently pictured by the President on January 22, 1917. The war method is the old, the long, the slow method, the unsafe and hopeless way. In this present war it is doubtful if even a military victory—the only possible excuse for war—can be achieved by either side. But victory or no victory, the millions of lost lives and treasure can not be recalled, the anguish of millions of innocents can not be assuaged, the heat of the war passions in millions of the earth's children will not soon be cooled, the bitterness and hatred of men and nations that should be brothers have poisoned innumerable sources of life and light and joy, and the moral and intellectual and religious hypocrisy of leading men will not soon be forgiven. No; the oppressed and driven and helpless peoples of all belligerents—be they called autocracies or democracies—will not forget this crime against them. The plain peoples of the world will find it hard to forgive this riot of power in the hands of a few overlords, and the peoples of the world will surely avenge this betrayal of life. Oh, that our voices, the voices of many peoples, might be heard, and that America might justify the world's high hopes of her by commanding peace forthwith as easily now she might. The President's peace aims can now be achieved without the killing of more millions. But the killing of more millions can never achieve these peace aims.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to section 2 will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry report to strike out section 2 on page 2.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Myers	Sherman
Bankhead	Husting	Nelson	Simmons
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sterling
Brady	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Stone
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Page	Thompson
Culberson	Kendrick	Penrose	Trammell
Curtis	Kenyon	Pittman	Underwood
Dillingham	King	Poindexter	Vardaman
Fernald	Kirby	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Knox	Ransdell	Williams
France	McLean	Reed	Wolcott
Gronna	McNary	Shafroth
Hale	Martin	Sheppard

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on official business.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained from the Senate on important business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. STERLING. I present two amendments intended to be proposed to the pending bill. I ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram in favor of certain amendments to the bill.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LARNED, KANS., June 30, 1917.

Senator CURTIS,
Washington, D. C.:

The officers and 200 stockholders of the Pawnee Grain & Supply Co. emphatically urge that in adopting food legislation the bill is so framed that control by the Government is obtained over what the farmers buy as well as over what they sell. We also urge with the greatest emphasis that large inheritances and excessive profits be heavily taxed, and that our Senators and Representatives see to it that farmers of this country are not burdened with any class legislation.

J. B. BROWN, President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to express the hope again to the Senate that we may be able to agree upon a time when we may vote on this so-called food-control bill. Two weeks and more have been consumed in the discussion of it, and I think all Senators who intended to deliver a general address on the subject have done so; but, of course, there are many important amendments pending which each Senator will want to discuss, probably not at great length, but to discuss to some extent.

In order to test the feeling of the Senate in reference to the subject of fixing a time to vote, again I desire to submit to the Senate a unanimous-consent agreement, and I ask that it be read. It is the same one which was presented yesterday, changing the date in it from the 3d until the 5th day of July.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I shall feel compelled to object at this hour in the day to any unanimous-consent agreement. I think it is needless for me to assure the Senator that I am in entire sympathy with his desire to get through with the bill promptly, but I have not yet noted any overt act in the nature of a filibuster, and I certainly favor free and fair discussion. There are a number of important amendments pending which I have not had an opportunity even to read yet. I do not think the Senator wants to throttle debate or, to use the newspaper parlance, "work the steam roller" on legislation of this magnitude and novelty.

I do not intend to adopt the policy indefinitely of making this objection, and I am acting entirely as an individual Member of this body. I want to have an opportunity to consider and, if possible, to discuss briefly some of these amendments. I shall be very glad to talk to the Senator later in the day about this unanimous-consent agreement, when we can ascertain what progress we are making. None of the independent amendments have even yet been taken up for consideration. We have only advanced as far as the first committee amendments, and it certainly is exhibiting undue haste to ask for a unanimous-consent agreement on a bill of which only one section has been read. I must therefore object at this time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, one objection will prevent the adoption of the unanimous-consent agreement. I want to disclaim any purpose to undertake to apply the steam roller. I would not if I could, and I could not if I would, because whenever that has been attempted in the Senate it has always utterly failed.

Neither, Mr. President, do I desire to indicate that there has been any filibuster against the bill. I do not claim that. All I claim is that it has been discussed pretty generally, discussed now to the exclusion of all other business, I think, for nearly two weeks. I forget just when the discussion commenced.

As I said before, I think those who intend to make general speeches upon the subject of the bill have done so. Even if we seek to apply the so-called cloture rule, that does not defeat debate. Each Senator will still have an hour within which to discuss the bill, and if there is no further general discussion to be participated in, it seems to me that is as much time as Senators would ordinarily require. I hope we may be able during the day sometime to fix a time when we may vote on the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to express the hope that the newspapers will not say that the friends of temperance objected to specifying a time for a final vote on the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the reading of the bill may be continued for action on the amendments of the committee.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I know how anxious the Senator from Oregon is to have this bill passed, and I think that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the Senate are anxious to have it passed. I have not taken a single moment of time to discuss the bill.

I am sorry, Mr. President, that I was not here last night when a very important amendment was offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I am glad, however, to see by reading the RECORD that his amendment was defeated, or rather it was withdrawn. I understand the Chair held that it was not germane. I should of course have voted against that amendment had I been here, and I should have voted as the majority voted for the committee amendment. But I did not rise purposely to explain my absence. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to certain facts.

I clipped from my home newspaper this morning the quotations for grain. The market price of No. 1 northern wheat the day the newspaper was printed, which was one day last week—Friday, I think—was $1.96 per bushel at my own home, Lakota, N. Dak.; No. 2 northern was $1.86; No. 3 northern, $1.76; durum wheat, $1.86, those four grades of wheat making a total of $7.44, or $1.86 per bushel. There is no reason in the world why flour should not be sold to-day at $8.50 and leave a splendid profit for the miller. Out of the 270 pounds of wheat the miller would have 74 pounds for his profit, which is a large profit in a business conducted on a large scale. I am calling attention to this fact so the Senators may know that the farmer is not getting $3 a bushel or $2 a bushel, as has been so often said on this floor and as has been stated by the press.

Mr. President, I believe that we ought to pass this food bill. I believe that the farmers of the United States have no objection to the passage of the bill provided all industries are treated alike. But I do know, and I am receiving thousands of letters and telegrams from my people not only from the State which I in part have the honor to represent but from all over the United States stating that they are in favor of a food-control bill, but they do not believe it is fair to single out this industry which by its very nature can not become a monopoly. They believe that we ought to give the President of the United States the power to regulate all industries during the war.

It seems to me, Mr. President, when we have given our boys, the best blood of this country, to defend the Nation we ought to be willing to give our wealth and our products to carry on the war in defense of our country. If we are not we will be known to the world as placing the sordid dollar or wealth above that of human life and human blood.

Mr. President, it was said on the floor of the Senate yesterday that this bill is being loaded down simply to defeat it. I resent that statement. I deny that such is my purpose, and I want to pay my compliments and a tribute to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I think the Senator from Missouri has done distinguished service to the country by his opposition to certain provisions of the bill.

Do you believe that the farmers of the country are so foolish that they do not understand that it is the purpose at least of some people to single them out and to get their product at whatever prices they may name? You may do it this year. The old expression, a homely one, "You may lead a mule to water, but you can not make it drink" will apply in this instance. You may take the farmer's product this year at your own price, but you will not be able to compel him to plant next year. He will not plant, because he will not be able to plant. He will not have the seed. He will not have the money to buy the seed if you do him an injustice this year.

We know that the farmer can not abandon his farm because his farm is his home, but when Senators say we are doing an injustice to the administration by not passing this bill immediately, and when we are simply adding provisions necessary to carry on the industry of farming, I disagree with such a statement. No Senator on this floor can justify such a position as that I know that binders to-day are worth $200, whereas before the war they sold at $140. We know that steel was sold at $30 per ton, whereas it is to-day being sold to the Government for $95 a ton. The farmer uses steel in all his machinery. We know that everything the farmer buys has advanced in price. He pays out practically everything he makes for machinery, for lumber, and for other material. Why should those not be included in this bill?

I am calling that to the attention not only of Senators here, but to those who are going to administer this bill when it becomes law. I think that those who are going to take charge of the administration of this important bill after it is enacted into law will need some advice. I do not know of any farmer or of any producer who has been called to the membership of the Council of National Defense; I do not know anyone representing this great industry, composed of about 35,000,000 people, who is represented in that council. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on yesterday pointed out that at least one individual, Mr. Davis, who himself represents one of the great trusts of this country, is a member of that council.

I think we ought to talk plain; I think we had better understand each other. I know that the greatest injury we can do to the country will be to discourage the farmers from planting and producing, and I know of no way we can do that better than to single them out and say, "You are the only ones who shall come under the administration of this law."

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 2, line 24, to change the number of the section from "3" to "2"; in the same line, after the word "That," to strike out "there is hereby established a governmental control of necessaries which shall extend to and include all the processes, methods, instrumentalities and activities of and for the production, manufacture, procurement, storage, distribution, sale, marketing, pledging, financing, and consumption of necessaries, which shall be exercised and administered by the President for the purposes of this act as hereinafter provided; and all such necessaries, processes, methods, and activities are hereby declared to be affected with a public interest. And"; on page 3, line 9, after the word "this," to strike out "section" and insert "act"; in line 11, before the word "use," to insert "create and"; and in the same line, after the word "accept," to insert "in his discretion," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized to enter into any voluntary arrangements or agreements, to create and use any agency or agencies, to accept, in his discretion, the services of any person without compensation, to cooperate with any agency or person, to utilize any department or agency of the Government, and to coordinate their activities so as to avoid any preventable loss or duplication of effort or funds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The language referred to might possibly be construed to specify the agency through which the President is to carry out the purposes of this proposed act. If this amendment of the committee should be adopted, would it preclude an amendment hereafter, general in its nature, directing that all the purposes of this act should be carried out through a board or commission to be created?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would not prevent an amendment of that character being offered, but it would create trouble in the administration of the act.

Mr. REED. I do not understand——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator from Missouri refer to section 3—the committee amendment?

Mr. REED. I am referring to the very language we are on. There is a rule that an amendment having been adopted can not be further amended as in Committee of the Whole. What I have in mind is this: It may be desired hereafter to offer an amendment providing for the carrying out of the purposes of this act through some board or commission, and as this language now under consideration apparently deals with that same subject matter, I am making the inquiry whether, as a parliamentary question, the adoption of this amendment would preclude an amendment of the character I have indicated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Two things can be done hereafter. After the adoption of this amendment the Senator from Missouri could move to strike out all of the language between lines 8 and 16, and to insert any language that he chose to insert, placing the carrying out of the provisions of the bill in the hands of persons or commission or officials; or the Senator from Missouri could offer a separate section. That was the answer which the Chair first made, understanding that the Senator from Missouri inquired whether a separate section to the bill could be offered placing the power in the hands of a commission or of certain named officials. The Chair said "Yes," but said, of course, in carrying out the bill there would be trouble, because there would be conflicting sections.

Mr. REED. I now understand the ruling of the Chair, and it is perfectly agreeable to me. I simply wanted to get the question clear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 3, after line 16, to insert:

SEC. 3. That it is hereby declared unlawful for any person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the Government in any capacity, including an advisory capacity to any commission, board, or council of the Government, to procure, attempt to procure, or make any contract for the purchase of any supplies for the use of the Government either from himself, from any firm of which he is a member, or corporation of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in which he has any financial interest. Any person violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the committee desires to perfect the amendment by adding what I send to the desk to this section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following proviso to the section which has just been read:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to prevent any such agent or employee of the Government, or any person acting in an advisory capacity, from rendering services and advice on any matter not connected with such purchase of supplies.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, with the general purpose of this amendment as brought before the Senate, I am in complete accord; but as to the amendment which the committee now suggests, I should like to have an opportunity to examine and to look into the language of it. I ask the chairman of the committee to agree to temporarily pass the matter and to go to some other amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in section 4, page 4, line 17, after the word "producing," to insert "harvesting"; in line 20, after "(d)," to insert "willfully"; in line 21, after the word "any," to strike out "necessaries, or" and insert "necessaries in order"; in line 23, after the word "necessaries," to strike out "s; or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section"; and in line 24, after the word "section," to insert "Any person who violates any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair, or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person, (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) willfully to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof, or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries. Any person who violates any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee why the language "or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section" is stricken out? Is it under the general principles of law that a person under such circumstances would be guilty?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the reason, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in section 5, page 5, line 7, after the word "necessaries," to insert "constituting a part of commerce with foreign countries, or among the several States, including the several Territories and the District of Columbia"; in line 10, after the word "shall," to strike out "publicly" and insert "by proclamation"; in line 12, before the word "engage," to strike out "announcement" and insert "proclamation"; in line 13, after the word "specified," to strike out "in the announcement of importation, exportation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement" and insert "therein"; in line 17, after the word "President," to strike out "is authorized to issue such licenses and to" and insert "shall"; in line 18, after the word "prescribe," to insert "such rules and," and in the same line, after the word "regulations," to strike out "for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees" and insert "governing the conduct of the business of licensees as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section"; on page 6, line 1, after the word "any," to strike out "rate" and insert "storage"; in the same line, after the word "charge," to insert "commission, profit"; in line 4, after the word "discontinue," to strike out "any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful rate, charge, or practice, thereafter" and insert "the same"; in line 7, after the word "order," to insert "which shall recite the facts found"; in line 10, after the word "unfair," to strike out "or wasteful rate" and insert "storage"; in the same line, after the word "charge," to insert "commission, profit"; in line 12, after the word "unfair," to strike out "or wasteful rate" and insert "storage"; in line 13, after the word "charge," to insert "commission, profit"; in line 14, after the word "fair," to strike out "or economical rate" and insert "storage"; in line 15, after the word "charge," to insert "commission, profit"; in line 16, after the word "any," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "suit" and insert "proceeding brought"; in line 17, before the word "court," to strike out "Federal or State"; in the same line, after the word "court," to strike out "of competent jurisdiction"; in the same line, after the word "such," to strike out "finding" and insert "order"; in line 21, after the word "section," to strike out "and any licensee who" and insert "or"; in line 23, after the word "unfair," to strike out "or wasteful rate" and insert "storage"; in the same line, after the word "charge," to insert "commission, profit"; and in line 25, after the word "section," to strike out "or willfully violates any provision of this section," so as to read:

SEC. 5. That, from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, exportation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, constituting a part of commerce with foreign countries, or among the several States, including the several Territories and the District of Columbia, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall by proclamation so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the proclamation, engage in or carry on any such business specified therein, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. The President shall prescribe such rules and regulations governing the conduct of the business of licensees as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order, to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory and unfair, storage charge, commission, profit, or practice. The President may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory and unfair storage charge, commission, profit or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory and fair, storage charge, commission, profit, or practice; and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the President shall be prima facie evidence. Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, knowingly engages in or carries on any busines for which a license is required under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of any order issued under this section or any regulation prescribed under this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 5, after the word "gardener," to insert "cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers," so as to read:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or other person with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him, nor to any retailer with respect to the retail business actually conducted by him, nor to any common carrier, nor shall anything in this section be construed to authorize the fixing or imposition of a duty or tax upon any article imported into or exported from the United States or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided, That for the purpose of this act a retailer shall be deemed to be a person, copartnership, firm, corporation, or association not engaging in the wholesale business whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 per annum.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am going to ask the Secretary if he will not kindly read a little slower?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I merely want, if the Senator is going to make objection to that amendment, to perfect the amendment on behalf of the committee. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 5, page 7, line 5, after the word "farmer," it is proposed to strike out the comma and insert the word "or," and in lines 5 and 6 in the committee amendment to strike out the words "cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners" and to insert in lieu thereof "agricultural or horticultural asssociations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator as to the insertion of the word "or" in the first amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was simply inserted so as to make the provision read:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer or gardener.

Mr. NORRIS. It comes in on line 5, between the words "farmer" and "gardener"?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is where the word "or" is inserted.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. I understand as to that. Now, I should like to ask the Senator about the other amendment which he has submitted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was thought that the language used in the bill, "cooperative asssociations of farmers or gardeners," might afford a means or a method of practically avoiding the law, because innumerable men might organize themselves into such asssociations.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that; but what was the amendment? That is what I want to know.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Secretary to read it; I have not a copy of the amendment before me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the provision as it will appear if the amendment be adopted.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 4, it is proposed to amend the proviso so that it will read:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer or gardener, agriculture or horticulture association instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or other person with respect to the products of any farm—

And so forth.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that the language used there is the same as that used in the Clayton Act. We followed that language in its entirety. We thought it would reach the case and not afford a method of avoiding the law.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether, in his judgment, the words "or other person," in line 6, would include a corporate person?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think they would.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Well, it seems to me, Mr. President, that there ought to be no question that a corporate person which is engaged in the farming business should be within the scope of this proviso.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call the Senator's attention to section 19, where it is provided:

SEC. 19. That words used in this act shall be construed to import the plural or the singular, as the case demands. The word "person," wherever used in this act, shall include individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations.

So that it does include corporations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I inquire what words follow immediately after the amendment proposed? I want to know if the words, in line 6, "including live-stock farmers" are left in the bill or taken out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have been taken out.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, Mr. President; those words are left in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As read by the Secretary they were not left in.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was not intended to strike out those words, I will say.

Mr. REED. I will ask that the amendment be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those words were left out as the amendment was stated by the Secretary a moment ago. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the proviso in section 5, page 7, beginning in line 5, so as to read:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer or gardener, agriculture or horticulture association instituted for the purpose of mutual help not having capital stock or conducted for profit, including live-stock farmers or other person with respect to the products of any farm—

And so forth.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that it would be a good deal better constructed if he would take those words "including live-stock farmers" and put them in after the word "farmer," in line 5, so that the provision would read:

That this section shall not apply to any farmer, including live-stock farmers or gardeners.

That is a mere matter of construction, and I simply make the suggestion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I personally have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this is my first opportunity to hear this amendment which has been suggested to the committee amendment. May I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if the amendment as now proposed would exclude from this exemption any and all farmers' associations that happen to be stock companies?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Organized for a profit?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They would not be exempted under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill if farmers' cooperative creamery companies—scores of which are stock companies, who necessarily have to sell their finished products, such as butter and cream, through the company and have the proceeds returned to them, some of them in the nature of dividends—are excluded from this exemption?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think they are, Mr. President.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The same would be the case with a cooperative association of fruit growers who happened, in order to transact their cooperative business in a practical manner, to have issued capital stock, and make some slight return upon that capital stock. This amendment would exclude them from the exemption?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it would. That was the purpose of the committee, as I understand it—to exclude those that are organized and doing business for a profit; and it is only intended to exempt those, as the language of the amendment states, who are organized for mutual help, and not for purposes of profit. The committee felt—at least, some of us did, and I did not hear any dissent from that view—that if any other system were adopted, a number of farmers, in order to avoid this law, might organize a corporation and carry it on for a profit; and that was what it was attempted to check in this measure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator from Oregon is fearful of something that can not possibly happen. It is utterly impossible for farmers to organize stock companies to deal in the products of their farms upon any such scale as will threaten the country, or any portion of the country, with a monopoly. I have in mind, however, a very healthy trend in the management of agricultural enterprises which is gradually, I am glad to say, spreading over this country, and that is the tendency of farmers to organize themselves locally into cooperative companies. It really makes for a cheaper food supply to the consumer, because it enables the farmers thus organized to purchase those supplies that are necessary for the operation of their farms by wholesale at a lower price, and it enables them to put their goods upon the market, as it were, by wholesale, and eventually at a lower price to the consumer. Instead of having less of those organizations, be they stock companies or merely mutual associations, I wish that their number were multiplied a thousand times.

Now, these associations are producers of food in exactly the same sense that the individual farmer is, and anything that we put into this bill or any other bill which discourages or casts any reflection upon this growing practice of organization amongst farmers is not going to do the consumers of this country any good. In fact, it will do them harm, for only by this method can we facilitate the production of food, distributing it, and marketing it. In my humble judgment, it represents about the only remedy which can be proposed to decrease the spread in cost between the money given to the producer of the food and the money paid by the ultimate consumer.

My understanding is, Mr. President, that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oregon arises from some fear that farmers' elevator companies are apt to indulge in the horrid practice of hoarding food and controlling the supply. I confess that I can not become very much frightened upon that score. It simply can not be done. This is too big a country and the farmers are too widely scattered over a country 3,000 miles east and west and 1,500 miles north and south.

This is the first time I have had an opportunity of hearing this amendment read. It was not presented at a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator, with reference to the adoption of the amendment, that, while the Senator from New York was not present, 14 or 15 of the members of the Agricultural Committee were present. They met Sunday and discussed this very proposition and adopted this amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from New York, if he will allow me, that farmers are specifically allowed under this bill to hoard. They have the specific authority in the next section to hoard.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not ask me to defend some of the inconsistencies of this bill.

Mr. LODGE. I only meant to indicate that the farmer seems to be pretty well cared for. He is allowed to do what it is made a crime for anybody else in the country to do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I received yesterday several letters and telegrams—which I have failed to bring over—from farmers, protesting against the very thing that the Senator is advocating, maintaining that it is a sort of privilege granted to a few farmers to organize themselves for the very purposes which would be condemned in other branches of the business if they were to be carried out. I am glad the Senator is talking about this matter, because I am not familiar with it; but I received these protests to-day and yesterday, insisting that the provision should not be allowed in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, perhaps I have not made myself entirely clear. I do not believe we ought to discriminate against a healthy business tendency. If we are going to exempt from the provisions of this section any persons engaged in agriculture, we ought to exempt them all; and if we have some fear that the exemption may be abused, we ought not to exempt anybody. But, as I have heard the amendment read by the Secretary, it would seem to me that it will disparage and discourage this tendency which is now going on among farmers and which I regard as extremely healthy.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, what I wished to call attention to was really on page 8, the hoarding section, and that not only specifically allows any farmer or gardener to hoard and withhold, but allows cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, to do so. It seems to me that the ingenious middle man will soon get in a position where he is a farmer or gardener, and he will control these cooperative associations, and then you will come back to the old difficulty.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to say, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, that he has not read all of the language. It applies only to the products produced on his farm. He will not be allowed to buy or sell. He will not be allowed to be a dealer in farm products.

Mr. LODGE. That is quite true, Mr. President; but the amendment of the committee permits this to be done by cooperative associations with regard to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him or by the association. All the farmers and gardeners in an association may hoard and withhold. When they form an association, it is pretty easy for gentlemen of the middleman class to get in there as farmers and gardeners.

Mr. GRONNA. But the Senator will understand that this provision is simply to permit associations to produce, not to sell.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is impossible for those of us in this part of the Chamber to hear what is being said.

Mr. LODGE. It allows them here to hold and accumulate and hoard for the purpose of holding back food from market.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes. Mr. President, I was going to say, with regard to the statement made by the Senator from New York, that I really agreed with him. I could see no danger in permitting farmers' organizations to be formed. There is only this difference between the language adopted by the subcommittee and the language which is now in the bill: The language proposed by the Senator from Oregon exempts agricultural and horticultural associations not organized for profit. The Senator from New York perhaps heard the statement—or perhaps he was not present—of Mr. Hoover, that there was some fear that the so-called farmers' elevators would be exempt, and that they would be allowed to hoard grain, which, of course, would be unfair. For that reason, we adopted the language proposed by the Senator from Oregon, so that only horticultural and agricultural associations not organized for profit should be exempt; and I can see no objection to that. I do not think farmers' elevators should be exempt any more than elevators organized by any other person or corporation. I do not believe that a public elevator owned by an individual farmer or by a partnership should be exempt any more than an elevator that is owned by a corporation if the individual person is engaged in the business for profit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is some doubt about the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oregon. I was at the meeting of the committee to which the Senator refers, held last Sunday. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] suggests that it was a conference and not a meeting of the committee. I presume it was both. I did not share in the apprehension expressed by Mr. Hoover with regard to his objection to this particular language. At the same time, I had no objection to any amendment that would clarify it and make it clear that farmers' associations should not be allowed to be guilty of hoarding in the sense in which it is defined in the bill. I did not want to exempt them from that.

I agree with the Senator from New York that there is very little danger of farmers forming such an organization that would be harmful. In fact, I can hardly see how it can be possible, in view of the immense scope of the country and the great number of farmers. At the same time, Mr. President, we ought to be careful that we make no mistake here by providing in this bill any regulation or law that will prevent the producer of anything from keeping it if he wants to and storing it until he gets ready to sell it; and that is the reason of the exemption contained in the next section to which our attention has been called by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Somebody must hold the grain that is produced until it is consumed. When wheat is harvested some one must hold the major portion of it until it can be made into flour and consumed by the people. If we made an ironclad rule here that no one could hold wheat, then there would be no possibility of saving enough of the wheat to last through the year.

It was the idea of the committee, and I think it is the idea of everybody who has given it any fair consideration, that the healthy place for the product to be held is in the hands of the man who produces it, and because it is a practical impossibility for the farmers of the United States, scattered as they are over such a vast territory, to organize and by combination bring about undue enhancement of the price, it was thought that we ought to give every encouragement we could to the farmer to hold his wheat, his corn, or the other products that he had raised on land owned, tilled, or rented by him.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I agree with the Senator that there is not the slightest danger of the farmers getting together to put up prices. They never have done it, and they never can do it. The section to which this amendment applies, however, is not the hoarding section, it is the license section.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the amendment were adopted and a license system were created by the authority of the President, every farmers' elevator and every creamery organized for profit would have to take out a license, provided the regulations were made to apply to that class of corporations. There is no question about that.

Mr. NORRIS. If the amendment were adopted, the Senator says?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; then they would have to take out a license.

Mr. NORRIS. If the amendment were not adopted, they would be specifically exempted?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; they would be exempted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the exemption in this section, as well as the one following it, providing for another exemption from hoarding applies only to land that is owned by these farmers or rented by them, cultivated by them. They can not go into the general business of buying and selling these products and be exempt, under the language of the amendment as the committee had it originally. The exemption applies only to products that they owned from the time they were produced from the soil. Now, if two or three farmers get together and build a large granary or an elevator, if you want to call it such, to save the expense of having separate granaries or elevators, and want to put their wheat in that elevator and hold it and sell it when they get ready, what is the objection to it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not be true that under the language as it now stands, with the first amendment, nothing could be stored in a granary and be relieved from the effect of this act unless it was raised upon the farm, garden, or land owned, leased, or cultivated by the particular men who were members of that association?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And it could not in any sense do a commercial business?

Mr. NORRIS. No; in no sense.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the danger that was feared, lest these warehouses might engage in a commercial business, is excluded now by the language of the act.

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely so, as I understand it. The more I look at it the more it seems to me it ought to remain just as it is. I do not think we can emphasize the importance of having some provision here so that the market for wheat, for instance, can be steadied during the year. We ought to make it easy for those who hold grain, who are not speculating in grain. One of the great objects of this legislation is to protect the man who produces foodstuffs, and, on the other hand, to protect the consumer of those same foodstuffs, to protect both these classes of people from the speculators or dealers, some of whom are necessary, I concede, and honest, I concede, who intervene between these two extremes.

Now, we will take wheat as an illustration. It is harvested in July and August, and it must last until the next July or August. A very large proportion of it must be stored and held by somebody. The man who stores it and holds it, whether he be the farmer or middle man, is entitled to a profit for doing it. That is just as necessary to be done as it is to produce the wheat, to begin with. The question is, where can it be most economically held? We have the producers, to begin with, scattered over an expanse of country thousands of miles in extent, as a class comparatively poor men, as a class unorganized, and from the very nature of conditions it is practically an impossibility to organize, so that monopoly as far as organization among them is concerned, is absolutely improbable if not an impossibility. I think under existing conditions it is an impossibility.

Then we ought to give that class of people all the possible encouragement we can to hold the wheat during the time that it is necessary it should be held. We can do that by exempting the producer. It is conceded that whatever enhancement of price may take place between the time the grain is produced and the time it is consumed can legitimately go and ought to go as much as possible to the man whose toil and whose exertion has produced it. We can prevent speculation in food products, therefore, if we can permit the food products to remain in the hands of the producer, and go out of his hands as the demand for consumption goes on during the year.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska absolutely that the farmers ought to be encouraged to hold their own grain, and I agree with everything he says theoretically, but he knows as a practical proposition that the business is not done that way. When grain is taken to an elevator it is not stored in the elevator. The farmer may not sell the grain, but the man who receives the grain immediately sells it. The Senator knows that that is the way business is being done. Now, how are we going to discriminate between an elevator which is a corporation owned by farmers and an elevator owned by people who do not farm? Both do business in exactly the same way.

The language in the bill, as the Senator knows, was proposed by myself, and I thought there was no danger in permitting farmers to store their own grain, but on reflection I must admit that it is impracticable, because when the grain is taken to the elevator it goes into commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota to face us so that we may hear him on this side? The Senator turns his back toward us, and we can not hear him.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not turn his back on me. I want to hear him. He is asking me a question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope we may have order in the Chamber, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. I asked the Senator from Nebraska if he thought we should discriminate between them; if the farmer entered into a partnership or into a corporation and was doing business exactly the same as a corporation is doing business, receiving wheat, when everybody who knows anything about transactions dealing in wheat must agree that when the wheat is taken to the elevator it is not being stored. The farmer may take a storage receipt and he may demand wheat of the same kind in return under our law, but the wheat goes into commerce immediately and is being sold. The wheat is not as a rule being stored there.

Now, I ask the Senator from Nebraska how he could discriminate between the men who are actual farmers owning elevators and the men who do not farm and own the same kind of elevators?

Mr. NORRIS. I shall be glad as best I can to answer the Senator's question. I think it is a very proper question, and I think he assumes something as existing in the bill that is not there now. The question is when the farmers' elevator company buys wheat and sells it why he should not have it subject to the same rules that every other elevator man is subject to? My answer is that is what should be. I answer further that under the bill as it is written now I think that would be the case. In other words, when the farmers' elevator company buys grain of somebody not a member of the company, or even from a member of the company if the grain was produced on some land not owned or cultivated or rented by a member of the company, then the language does not apply as it stands in the bill, and they would be compelled to take out a license the same as anybody else. Is not that true, I will ask the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, I will say to him that under the laws of every Western State, at least, I do not care who builds the elevator when an elevator is operated by buying and selling grain it becomes a public elevator and must buy from anybody who may offer grain for sale. It can not take grain only from the farmers, most of whom may be stockholders of that elevator, but it must under the law buy from anybody who offers grain for sale.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; a public elevator has that kind of a law to work under, no matter where it is, but still the answer I think I made before is good. The elevator that is doing that would not be excluded under the language of the bill. Let me read, on page 7, the proviso commencing in line 4:

> Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or other person with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. By whom?

Mr. NORRIS. "Him" refers to the farmer or gardener or the association of farmers or gardeners. That is the antecedent of "him," as I understand the language here.

Mr. STERLING. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that that could be cured and made plain by inserting the words "or them" after "him."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; if there is any doubt about it. I do not think there can be any doubt about it as it stands, but there can be no objection to adding the words "or them" after "him." I believe on reflection it will have to be conceded that the farmers' elevator company is not exempted if it is located where it buys and sells grain from everybody who offers grain.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator if when we contemplated this amendment we were not under the impression that this language freed all those elevators?

Mr. NORRIS. That is what we thought, and that is the reason we conceded to the arguments made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We were perfectly willing that all elevators which were engaged in buying and selling and doing commercial business generally so owned by farmers should be treated as other similar elevators.

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly; they ought to be treated like anybody else's elevator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But my own closer study of the language since our committee adjourned satisfies me that the language as written only reaches to products dealt with by these associations; that if the association goes into commercial business generally this language will subject such association to the law.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon me, I am very glad to hear the distinguished Senator from Georgia say what he has just said. As the Senator knows, I proposed this language, and it was my opinion as stated by the Senator that it only exempts those farmers who really raise the grain. Now the Senator has come to the conclusion that I was right. I should be very glad to join him because I believe I was right when I proposed the language. I did not want to exempt anybody who did business, who entered into interstate commerce in buying and selling grain, but I do not think that the language does that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to make that statement again, if the Senator will allow me, in the presence of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was that my subsequent study of this language since our conference of Monday leads me to the conclusion that it applies only to those cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners which handle the product alone of farmers who are members of those associations, and the product of those farmers raised on their own land or their own leased or cultivated land, and that if such an association undertook to do business with outsiders, or to handle the products of outsiders, they would, as the language is now written, without further amendment, be subject to the regulation covered by this provision. With that view I hardly think the amendment we worked out on Sunday is necessary. I think the language now does what we want it to do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit me first to make a few suggestions about the meeting? I will yield to him later.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was merely going to say to the Senator if the members of the committee are satisfied that the amendment as it is in the bill does what it is our purpose to do, to prevent speculation, and that no amendment is necessary, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to leave the language as it is. As a matter of fact, I am inclined to believe that the language does just what the proposed amendment does anyhow.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the discussion in the committee turned on the fact that wherever there was a corporation or an association of farmers the only thing they could deal in was that which they raised themselves. This language was framed with that object in view, not to apply to those organizing themselves to buy other farmers' grain or anybody else's grain.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, at that meeting it was suggested by Mr. Hoover that this language permitted farmers' elevator companies to be excluded. We had a letter there from Mr. Shortell, representing a large number of farmers, the National Association of Farmers, in which he said that he did not want to have farmers' elevator companies excluded; that they wanted to be subject to the same law that everybody else was subject to. Without giving it very much consideration then, the committee said if it does that that is something we have no desire to do. Here are the men we want to protect. A corporation owns a farm, and let us say it raises a thousand bushels of wheat. It ought to be treated just the same as though one individual raised that wheat on his own land. An association or a partnership of two men may rent a half section of land and raise a lot of wheat or corn. They are an association, a partnership, or a corporation. We want to exclude them from the things they themselves produced, and if we let in anybody else we want to take that out.

This amendment was evolved for the purpose, as I understand it, of excluding something that, without looking into the bill particularly at the time, it was conceded ought to be excluded; but upon further examination and upon further study I believe everyone must admit that the fear was without foundation. A farmers' elevator company doing business as other elevators never was exempt by the language, and the idea of the committee originally was to do that very thing.

I am satisfied if anyone will examine it he will see that by no possible construction can any farmers' elevator company or any individual be relieved from this law if he is operating an elevator and buying and selling wheat or corn or any other products.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It seems to me there is no dispute among the members of the committee as to the intent of the language. I take it the amendment which is proposed now was proposed for the purpose of making it clear. But I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska, who is on the committee and who has given this subject a good deal of attention, what objection there is to the substitution of this amendment if it clarifies the point?

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place it does not clarify the point, as I understand it. I never heard it read until it was read here on the floor. It would eliminate from the exemption such associations as I have mentioned, as I understand it, that produce grain from their own land, wheat or corn, if it was an association, corporation, or partnership.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I ask the Senator if he does not consider the language now in the bill clear? I think no one could misunderstand it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see a possibility of misunderstanding it. All you have to do is to read it, and you will find that it applies to the products that are produced by men who form the association, and whenever it applies to anything else they are not exempted under the law.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I simply wish to say that under the amendment as amended and reported from the committee an association composed of stockholders would be exempt, but the amendment suggested by the Senator [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] in charge of the bill would include every association composed of stockholders. I think it would be unwise to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator in charge of the bill, because it will shut out farmers' cooperative associations composed of stockholders. Such organizations should be permitted to hold the products of the farms owned by their members, and they and the farmers and gardeners should be exempted from this section of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. In conclusion I wish to read the language as it would read without the amendment now offered by the Senator from Oregon. Let me read it:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, or other person with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him.

Just as soon as you get onto somebody else's land and get a product, if they deal in it, they are subject to the same provisions of the law that everybody else is. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Oregon will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in view of the discussion that has been had on it by members of the committee I am willing to withdraw the amendment if there is no objection to its withdrawal. I think myself that the language as it is written in the bill is sufficient.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Oregon that the suggestion was made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] that "associations" ought to be in the singular instead of the plural. I would like the attention of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. In line 5 let it read "cooperative association of farmers" in place of "cooperative associations of farmers." Ought it not to be in the singular instead of the plural?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to have the "s" stricken out.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest then that by unanimous consent we change "associations" to "association," and then, though it is not proper now, I think when the time comes when we get to individual amendments after the word "him" we ought to insert "or it."

Mr. GRONNA. Or them.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose "association" being in the neuter gender we can insert "it," but we can attend to that when we get through with the committee amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut has been recognized.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is getting to be a town meeting.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Do I understand it to be the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska that the language "cooperative associations" would embrace stock corporations?

Mr. NORRIS. I presume so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My impression is that the phrase "cooperative associations" would cover only voluntary associations, unincorporated associations of individuals. Do I understand it to be the view of the Senator—and I am in accord with him on it—that if these associations organize for mutual benefit, if they take the form of a stock company, they ought to be within the proviso?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Therefore I would suggest an amendment so that it would read "cooperative associations or corporations"——

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to that, but I think that is included now.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Or the words "or stock companies" should also be added—some such language as that.

Then, I want also to ask the Senator another question, if the Senator from Connecticut will permit me. I understood the Senator from Nebraska to say that this language as phrased would permit the organizing of mutual benefit companies or associations by farmers, which concerns might handle the products of all the members, and thereby exempt themselves from the terms of this proviso.

Mr. NORRIS. Not from the terms of the proviso, but from the section.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes. That is to say, there is nothing to prevent a body of farmers in a certain community organizing an association or a corporation for the purpose of taking the products of all and marketing them through a common source?

Mr. NORRIS. Or holding them.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Or holding them. Now, then, I question very much if that will be true, and I call the Senator's attention to this thought: The language is—that this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners "—

And so on, how far—with respect to the products of any farm * * * cultivated by him.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is to say, the product must be from a farm cultivated by the association?

Mr. NORRIS. No; they would not necessarily have to cultivate it. By the way, the organization would not have to be composed of men who actually farm if they owned the land.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. On which the foodstuff was produced. They would have a right to organize if they wanted to do so, and they would be exempt.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I can not agree with the Senator on that. I think this language clearly indicates that the products must be raised by the association as distinguished from its members.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us see. It reads: "with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned"—that is one.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. "Leased"—that is two.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. "Or cultivated by him."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, if the land was owned——

Mr. WALCOTT. By him.

Mr. NORRIS. If the land upon which the products were produced were owned by that man, this exemption would apply.

Mr. WOLCOTT. To that man. But we are talking about the case of an association. The word "him" refers back. You would then have the situation that the products must come from lands owned, leased, or cultivated by the association. There should be inserted the words "by him, it, or by any member thereof."

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that that would cure it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is of decided importance.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see that that would add anything to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] has in a certain way made a suggestion that I have had in mind. I assume that it is the desire of everybody to do ample justice to the farmer in the production and marketing of his food products, and at the same time not to allow any farmer or association of farmers or combination of farmers to do anything in the way of hoarding food or speculating in food. I am sure I want to do perfect justice to the farmer, but I confess, Mr. President, I do not understand clearly the meaning of this proviso.

I have read from time to time of various associations of agricultural producers through their organization handling their crops and their products in such a way as to hold them back from the market. I have read of cotton associations which through their organization were able either by moral suasion or by direct agreement among the members to hold back cotton for higher prices. I have read particularly of the producers of dairy products in the State of New York having such a close organization as that they were able to hold back entirely the dairy products of their farms, and thereby force the consumers in the large cities, who probably were also organized through their retail dealers, to pay such prices as the producers demanded.

It seems to me, if the language of this bill is left as it is, that any kind of an association of producers that have a mind to get together, have a meeting of their members and just agree to hold back from the market the products of their farms, or so much of them as they have a mind to, until the price goes up, it could be done, and they would be specifically exempted from the provisions of this section.

I may be wrong about that; but, if I am right about it, Mr. President, the bill fails right at the source.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I know the Senator is just as anxious as I am, and I am just as anxious as he is, as to any combination of that kind, to do the best we can to prohibit it in a practical way; but I want to direct the attention of the Senator, right in connection with the remarks he is now making, to a case. Suppose we exempt nobody, then the individual who produces, let us say, wheat or cotton will probably be frightened, not so much as to this particular provision as the one that follows it in the next section; he would be afraid that he would be guilty of hoarding, though he had produced the article himself. Even though we did let somebody in—I do not believe we do; but even if we did—if we had no exception can not the Senator see at once that there would be great danger in products such as I have mentioned not being produced in sufficient quantities? You would frighten the producer. Does not the Senator agree with me that it is desirable, if we can arrange it so that the producer of a food product, which in the very nature of things must be held, should be held preferentially by the man who produces it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, so far as the effect on the consumer is concerned—and he is the gentleman whom this bill is trying to relieve from the strangle hold of high prices and hoarding and speculating—it seems to me it is immaterial who has him by the throat.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if you will do it entirely from the viewpoint of the consumer that would be true; but does not the Senator agree with me that in the end, in order to protect the consumer, we must stimulate production or that in the end the consumer will not be protected? In an article like wheat would it not be better for the consumer now to have these various profits that are made from the time the wheat is produced until it reaches him just as small and just as few as possible? Would it not also be better for the consumer that whatever profit may come in the holding of wheat should be made by the man who produces it, and thus encourage him to produce more, than to permit it to get out of his hands and into the hands of a few people, who by organization or monopoly might be able to unduly increase the price which the consumer in the end would have to pay?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it must be borne in mind in the consideration of this bill, as applied to farm products, at least, that the President is authorized to fix a minimum price. The producer is the only person who is going to be guaranteed by the United States Government a minimum price, and there is money appropriated in this bill for that purpose. Of course, that is supposed to be a price which will reimburse him for the cost of raising his product and give him a profit. Unless the minimum price fixed by the Government carries to the farmer a profit, of course this bill, instead of promoting production, will stifle it.

If a man starts out with a guaranteed profit by the Government and then also is excepted from the operations of the bill as to hoarding and holding which apply to everybody else, and then is given authority to hold up the market by holding back his product through organized associations of his confrères in the same county and the same State, it seems to me that it is giving him an undue privilege. I want to give him an equal privilege; I want to protect him in every way; but I think he certainly has an equal privilege if he is the only person who has a guaranteed price. While, of course, I can not definitely predict that it will be done under the language of this proviso or how far it would be sustained by the courts, it does seem to me that it leaves the matter in great confusion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that the Senator is correct in his construction as to the effect of this proviso. It reads:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or other person with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him—

Of course, the "cultivated by him" also means cultivated by the association.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And that association might include all the farmers in a given State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see nothing to prevent it.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see how any other construction can be placed upon it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In other words, under this exception here is what I see might be done, if people were evilly disposed and the Government did not have the power to stop it:

All the farmers in any State or all the producers of food might form an agricultural association, of which each one would be a member, and they might all lease their farms to the association, and then the association could run the whole thing as a corporation and control the whole product. If that could be done, I can conceive no more absolute form of monopoly than that which would result from such an arrangement.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut, in connection with what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has said, what is to prevent the middlemen, the packers of Chicago, for example, under the live-stock provision, becoming members of these associations? It would not be a very difficult thing to do, and they have great organizing capacity. Then we would have a food trust that would control pretty much everything.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator from Connecticut, in order for that to be accomplished the packers of Chicago would, under the provisions of this bill, have either to buy or lease all the pasture lands of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. All they would have to do to become a member of such an association would be to buy one farm.

Mr. WADSWORTH. To become a member?

Mr. LODGE. That is all—each one of them. They could employ dummies; they have unlimited money; and it would not cost a great deal for them to buy enough farms or enough gardens or enough live stock to become members of such associations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator really think that any persons engaged in a commercial business are going to follow such a course under this bill? They could have done that in the past or they could do it now; and why have they not done that before this?

Mr. LODGE. Because a law has never existed giving to farmers, associations of farmers, associations of gardeners and live-stock owners the sole privilege in the United States to hoard, withhold, and accumulate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I remember——

Mr. LODGE. It confers a very valuable privilege.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Connecticut, and I do not wish to do that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is quite welcome to do so, if he wants to speak further.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It strikes me, Mr. President, that the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is one that we will never see carried out on this earth. Of course, we can imagine almost anything if we let our imaginations run riot; but seriously to contend that the so-called Chicago packers could under this provision furtively become members of a farmers' cooperative association, and then by some hocus-pocus control the whole association through the holding of stock, and thereby gain control of cooperative associations that deal in cheese, cream, butter, fruit, wheat, and vegetables, is to contend for something that I simply can not comprehend. It is beyond the range of human possibility.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I rather disagree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], because it is not necessary for them to do that. The packers already control the situation, so far as that is concerned. They fix the price of farm products, so far as live stock is concerned, now, and it would not be necessary for them to become members of an association in order to do so. But it does seem to me, if we are going to try to get a true construction of this bill, that "cooperative associations of farmers" would include any combination or association, and would include the product which belonged to that association under any fair construction of this bill. That is the way it seems to me. It may be a good thing to put in; I do not say it is not; but that is certainly a fair interpretation of the language.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator from Connecticut resumes, will he pardon me for making one suggestion?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It may be true that there is nothing in this bill that would prevent so complete an organization of farmers as might entirely control and hoard the grain products of the United States; but, while it is not in this bill, I have no doubt that those who have had any experience with grain farmers, or any other class of farmers, know that without the bill it is utterly impossible. Those who have ever tried to organize farmers, to induce them to take care of their own interests by cooperative holding understand that it is simply almost a hopeless task, and, with nothing in this bill upon the subject, we may all safely rely upon the fact that there will be no such combination or hoarding by farmers as will prevent the American people from getting their food at a reasonable price.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, after listening to the assurance given by the omnipotent Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am simply speaking from experience and observation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And the very confident and smooth way he has of giving bond for the people of the country——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If I had the money, I would give the bond, but at present such a course would be impossible.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator's confidence is well placed, and if his lack of confidence in the organizing ability of these intelligent farmers is also well placed, then there is absolutely no reason for having this proviso excepting them at all. If there is no danger to be apprehended from them, this proviso might as well be stricken out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the object is to encourage them to do all they can toward cooperation. I think those who have been giving special attention to the agricultural situation realize the value of whatever cooperation can be brought about among the farmers; and the Department of Agriculture has been sending documents throughout the land to try to inspire them to greater cooperation. The object of putting in this proviso was to say to the farmers, "We do not mean by this measure to discourage cooperation among you; we realize that as a valuable contribution so far as it goes, but it is not going nearly so far as we should like for it to go toward helping the development of the soil of the country."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, nobody has any objection to the kind of cooperation that is exercised in a benevolent way by the Department of Agriculture and the other friends of the farmers through the country, to get them to help themselves. It is the cooperation that results in withholding their products from the market for higher prices that we are concerned in, and that is all. If they have intelligence enough—and I think they have—to combine and cooperate for their mutual benefit in other respects, and if it is profitable for them to hold back their food for a higher price, with a special exemption in this bill prohibiting them from being prosecuted for doing so, I think very likely they will take all that they can get, just as the coal operators say they will take all that they can get in the open market.

Now, I do not object to this language so much in this particular section, because this section is simply the section that authorizes the President to compel them to take out a license. Nobody thinks, of course, that anybody would compel a farmer to take out a license to run his own farm. It is the next section, the holding back from the market, where the same identical language occurs, that I think may import a danger.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, take grain. It is produced and brought upon the market within about 60 days. For 12 months it is to be eaten. The consumer buys it, probably, by the week. Who is to hold it in the meantime? Somebody must. It is the opinion, I think, of the Department of Agriculture and those who have given study to the development of the agricultural interests that, as far as possible, encouragement to the farmer to sell as the consumer needs his product rather than to rush it upon the market and leave it for the speculator to buy and hold until the consumer needs it is generally beneficial to the agricultural interests of the country and not harmful in any way to the consumer; and it is rather the encouragement to the farmer to sell as the consumer needs his product than any hoarding that has been taught and is now being taught by the National Department of Agriculture and the State departments of agriculture throughout the country.

Now, if they are not encouraged to hold, if they do not hold, then somebody else—some speculator—must buy and hold, because the consumers only buy, as a rule, by the week, and the consumption is to take place in 12 months' time, while production comes from the field, as to the great staple crops, in 60 days.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there is a great difference between storing simply for the sake of preserving a thing until it is needed for consumption and hoarding. I am not objecting to the farmer storing his grain. If it can be done on his farm cheaper than it can in some storage warehouse, well and good. Nobody is talking about that at all. We are passing a bill here which puts pains and penalties against a producer hoarding a thing, and we put in the bill a provision that whenever the President has reason to believe that he is holding for hoarding purposes—that is, to hoard up the product and hold on to it for the purpose of raising the price—that is a crime. Now, we propose to exempt all the farmers, if I understand the terms of the bill, and say that they can get together and put their farms together and organize the owners of them, and that nothing in this bill that prevents hoarding shall apply to a farmer or an association of farmers or an agricultural association. It is simply a sense of fair play that lies in me, that when you are purporting and pretending to be trying to do justice among the people and produce fairly cheap food and stabilize prices and prevent people from holding up the consumer, when you pass a bill of 22 pages doing that to everybody else, you should not practically say: "Free license is hereby given to all the farmers and horticultural and agricultural societies to do these things." I simply believe that sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, is there not a broad distinction between the provision of the House bill, which perhaps necessarily and specifically gave the right to the individual farmer, and the Senate amendment allowing him to organize for the purpose of hoarding?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think so, and I thought so all the more when I heard the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] say that in his opinion the words "cooperative associations" would include a corporation. If I thought that I should be all the more alarmed about the provision. If they can organize a corporation to hoard and speculate in their own products, what is the use of talking about killing off the middleman, if you give the whole power to the originator to do these things?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement in reference to this matter.

It seems to be in the mind of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the parallel between a farmer and a cooperative organization holds good in reference to the middleman. Now, let us take Chicago or Kansas City or St. Louis. A little group of men there buy the product of America in wheat. Does either one of them pretend to say that there is even an approximate parallel between those men and a little group of farmers in Iowa, in Idaho, or out in Kansas, who meet for the purpose of putting their mutual products together so as to watch a market over which they have not any appreciable control, when the vast army of producers who control the surplus will not join these organizations—the little weak fellows, the men who have already pledged their crop for the production of it, and it is distressed wheat like other distressed farm products, and who must put it on the market? Do you pretend to say that there is any parallel between these small men and the aggregations of unlimited wealth who stand at concentrating points, the points to which all the lines and the entire commerce of the country converge, and who buy the crop from these men who notoriously are without resources, who get but a modicum out of it when the expenses are paid? Is there any comparison between the latter and these corporations that we are attempting to put our hands on, who buy the 12 months' supply when debt and obligations have matured on the farmer, who must meet his obligations?

There is the case of the potato crop now. The farmer has to sell to meet obligations incurred in the production of the crop. Those that want to buy now are comparatively few. There are great potato centers, and the men there buy up the crop, and with their reserve capital they can put on the crop any price that they see fit. Is there any comparison whatever between such small, weak aggregations of actual producers and the middlemen who take advantage of the present conditions?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I have not quite such a low opinion of the farmer's capacity as the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from South Carolina. I think he has shown himself in some States—I know he has in mine—to be an extremely capable and effective organizer. But when he is exempted, when he is the only class in the country who can hoard and accumulate without committing a crime, I think he will not be slow to take advantage of it. The poor farmer, obliged to sell his crop immediately, has just been destroying thousands of bushels of potatoes down in Virginia because the market price was too low.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have not heard of any destroying. They simply did not want to incur further expense in harvesting a crop on which they are already sustaining a loss.

Mr. LODGE. They destroyed them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I doubt the accuracy of the information which came to the Senator from Massachusetts in that respect.

Mr. LODGE. At all events, they took organized action in regard to it, and in a great many States they have taken organized action of the most efficient kind. They are quite capable of it, and I think they are perfectly capable—not under the House provision, but under the amendment of the Senate—of making organizations which will control every food crop in the country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me ask the Senator this question, because that is a statement that ought to be clarified right now: Has the Senator any authoritative information that the farmers, the potato producers, have destroyed their potatoes?

Mr. LODGE. I only know what I read in the newspapers about that case in Virginia.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. One case?

Mr. LODGE. I have not investigated it. I only know that it was serious enough for Mr. Hoover to investigate.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. Hoover stated that there was nothing to it.

Mr. LODGE. Well, I am delighted to hear it. Of course, they have not organized under this law, because this law has not existed heretofore and does not exist now; but, judging from their capacity in organizing in regard to dairy products, as they do in the East, as they organize in the West, where they control some great States, I think they have lots of intelligence and great capacity for organization, and you are giving them the authority to hold up every food crop in the country, when this whole bill is intended to lower the price.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts, if the farmer is so splendidly organized and is now destroying his potatoes, why did he let the market go down on them? Who was controlling the market that has gotten down to a point where it is not profitable to sell?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have nothing to do with potatoes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But the Senator used that as an illustration.

Mr. LODGE. I used what I saw in the papers about Virginia. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] tells me that Mr. Hoover has investigated it, and that it was a misstatement. We all saw what was in the papers. That is unimportant, however.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But this is very important: If the farmer organizes to a point where, as the Senator says, he is a menace and a danger to the consuming public, why did he let the potato market go down? Why did he not hoard the crop? The Senator says that the farmer has great capacity for organizing.

Mr. LODGE. He has no opportunity to hoard and accumulate until he is given a monopoly of hoarding and accumulating by this bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, has he not got the monopoly now, if he is a producer?

Mr. LODGE. He is not organized yet.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Precisely.

Mr. LODGE. If you invite him to organize——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. For 2,000 years he has had the same opportunity to organize that the Steel Trust has and that the grain combination in Chicago has. He has not done it, because it is a financial and moral impossibility.

Mr. LODGE. But he never before has had the sole opportunity of any people in this country to organize. You are giving him this great power, which he never has had before.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; and I can tie a bundle of hay in the top of a tree and give a mule the privilege of eating it, but the thing is that he can not get up the tree to get it. The same is true about the farmer.

Mr. LODGE. Would the Senator advise legislating to the effect that mules shall have a right to be fed in the tops of trees?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; if you are going to benefit the mule, I would advise giving him the hay.

Mr. LODGE. Exactly; that is what I say. You are going to give him the right——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But I want to make this point: The Senator from Massachusetts knows that the farmer that produces this stuff, spread as he is throughout the whole population, if no other economic principle was involved in this matter except this one, should become the beneficiary of the profit on the thing that he produces. It would be a distribution of wealth that the consumers might well contribute, and hope to get back in beneficial returns. But when a little coterie of men at the great centers, made possible by our facilities for transportation, who neither sow nor reap, control the price both to the consumer and the producer, and have a congestion, and a dangerous congestion, of wealth, I think the Senator from Massachusetts would give the privilege to the farmers to distribute among themselves the profits on their own products.

Mr. LODGE. Why, of course I should; but we should not substitute one little coterie for another.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am substituting the entire agricultural population of this country, and authorizing them to get together and enjoy the profits that accrue from their labor, rather than a coterie of men at the great centers of this country.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I ask leave to introduce an amendment, and ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I believe that the question was on the adoption of the original amendment, as reported by the committee, appearing in the bill on page 7. I ask for a vote. I believe there was no objection to my withdrawing the subsequent committee amendment, and now the question is on the amendment as it is contained on page 7, lines 5 and 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Without objection, the Senator will be allowed to withdraw his amendment. The question is on the amendment of the committee as modified.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the proceedings of the Senate, but I simply want to say a word.

I do not think it will make very much difference whether we adopt the amendment proposed by the committee or the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon. Everybody knows that it will be impossible for farmers to set up an elevator and simply store their own product. That is not the way business is being done, nor could it be done in that way under the laws of any State.

I want to say one word in reply to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, that this gives the farmers an opportunity to organize and hoard and exact unduly high prices. I think, if the Senator will pardon the statement, that that is rather a visionary statement. I think everybody knows that it would be an absolute impossibility for farmers to any great extent to organize any association and control the entire crop. We all know, as the Senator from Georgia has so well said, that all these crops are marketed within a period of time of about 60 days. The farmer must sell his product because he owes money; he is in debt. He is, as a rule, heavily in debt, and there are only a very few farmers who could hold their crop if they wanted to. I do not believe that this provision will give the farmer an opportunity to hoard his grain if he wanted to, because the moment the farmer takes his crop to a public elevator he deposits that crop there in the same course of business that a man outside the organization would sell it. It immediately becomes a public warehouse or a public elevator. No discrimination can be made.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he has ever known a cooperative association of farmers, outside of a farmers' elevator company, organized for the purpose of holding grain or hoarding grain?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I have not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I had supposed that this language was put in this bill for the specific purpose of permitting farmers to do these precise things. I assumed it was intended to encourage the producers, and that the language was framed to authorize holding products if it was deemed advisable so long as the products were still in the hands of the producers. I am not urging that the purpose is not a wise one. I am simply contending for the plain meaning of the language.

Mr. GRONNA. No; if the Senator will pardon me, that matter was thoroughly discussed in committee. It was put in the bill for the purpose of permitting the farmer to hold at least enough grain on his own farm or in his own warehouse for seed and flour for his own family.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, of course that might have been the object, but that can not possibly be the construction of the language. Now, I do not say that this language should go out. I am not arguing that proposition; but certainly the language as it is in here can have no other fair construction than to permit the farmers to do the precise things which have been designated here, and which it is probable that they would do. I do not undertake to say that the farmers could organize and hoard and hold these products; but, as the Senator from Georgia well said, it was put in there, it would seem to me, for the purpose of encouraging those precise things.

Mr. GRONNA. For the purpose of encouraging cooperation.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; for the purpose of encouraging cooperation. Now, you do not have to have cooperative societies for a man to hold enough grain for seed, nor do you need any permission of law to do so.

Mr. GRONNA. But there are societies known as associations where they are permitted to hold grain to furnish flour for their families and for seed.

Mr. BORAH. I am not saying they should not be permitted to hold it, but I ask does the bill authorize farmers in cooperative societies to hold grain for their own support?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Idaho that while possibly the result might follow as described by the Senator from Idaho, yet it is the remotest thing in all the world. Let me say further to the Senator——

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is presenting a question I did not present at all. I did not say that the farmers would do that. What I say is that the construction of this language would undoubtedly permit them to do it.

Mr. STERLING. I may be permitted to say that they ought to be permitted to do it as far as they will do it in the ordinary course of things.

Mr. BORAH. That is an entirely different proposition. That is what I supposed it was put in here for.

Mr. STERLING. For the reason that they could hold it by arrangement or understanding between the members of a community of farmers to avail themselves of a better market, for example, not that they will hold it and hoard it as against consumption generally but that they may for market purposes hold their grain for a time, is deemed wise and advisable, I think, everywhere.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I supposed it was put in for.

Mr. LODGE. They hold it to get the best price they can.

Mr. STERLING. I will not say that, but I will say the interests and the needs of the farmers in any extended community will be such as to prevent their holding it indefinitely. As has been described by the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from South Carolina, it would be impossible to form that kind of an organization among the farmers.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply want to say, as I said a moment ago, that, in my judgment, it would not make any difference whether the language of the committee is adopted or the language proposed by the Senator from Oregon. We know it is absolutely impossible for several million farmers to get together and agree upon hoarding.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from North Dakota will permit me, there is just this difference in the language as now suggested by the chairman of the committee and the language in the bill. The language proposed by the chairman is "agricultural and horticultural associations" instead of "cooperative associations" of farmers, and so forth. In nearly every State in the Union I think there are such agricultural associations, and those words have a particular and distinct meaning, and as State agricultural associations provide for and manage the fairs and the agricultural and stock exhibits of the State. Likewise there are State horicultural societies. They would not be included.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not disagree with the Senator about that at all.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. BRADY. I am somewhat disturbed about the construction that seems to be placed upon the amendment. As a member of the Agricultural Committee, I listened very attentively to all the arguments, and my understanding of the section is that it is to limit the holding in elevators of the grain farmers actually produce.

Mr. GRONNA. That is it.

Mr. BRADY. If that is not the case, then I do not understand the amendment. The proviso reads:

That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or other person with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator from Idaho is eminently correct in his definition of the language. It was so understood by me in the committee, but when it was objected to by some Senators I had no objection to modifying it, because I know under the general rules of business the only advantage that the farmer can hope to get will be to permit him to store enough grain for seeding his own farm and for feeding his own family, and that associations of farmers may do the same thing. I do not think it makes very much difference whether we adopt the amendment of the committee or the language proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I may be a little late in my understanding, but I understood that the Senator from Oregon had withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Oregon withdrew the last suggested amendment and the bill stands with the first amendment as printed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the question is not on the amendment as modified.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So the question before the Senate will be on the amendment as printed in italics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the word "associations" was changed to "association."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; striking out the "s." That was done by consent, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as thus modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, in section 6, on page 7, line 18, after the word "That," to strike out "any person who willfully hoards any necessaries shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both. Necessaries," and insert "necessaries"; in line 22, after the word "either," to strike out "(a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any person in a quantity in excess of his reasonable requirements for use or consumption by himself and dependents for a reasonable time"; in line 25, before the word "held," to strike out, in the parenthesis, the letter "b" and insert the letter "a"; on page 8, line 5, after the word "quantities," to strike out "reasonably" and insert "seasonally"; and in line 11, after the word "gardener," to insert "cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded within the meaning of this act when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; or (b) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of unreasonably increasing or diminishing the price: Provided, however, That any accumulating or withholding by any farmer, gardener, cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or any other person, of the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be hoarding within the meaning of this act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In order to make that conform to a preceding section, I move to insert the word "or" after the word "farmer," in line 11, and to strike out the "s" at the end of the word "associations."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 9, line 1, after the word "as," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "near" and insert "nearly," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That whenever any necessaries shall be hoarded as defined in section 6 they shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same are found and seized by a process of libel for condemnation, and if such necessaries shall be adjudged to be hoarded they shall be disposed of by sale in such manner as to provide the most equitable distribution thereof as the court may direct, and the proceeds thereof, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid to the party entitled thereto. The proceedings in such libel cases shall conform as nearly as may be to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States. It shall be the duty of the United States attorney for the proper district to institute and prosecute any such action upon presentation to him of satisfactory evidence to sustain the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 8, to strike out:

SEC. 8. That any person who willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 13, to strike out:

SEC. 9. That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries; or (e) to enhance the price of any necessaries shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 23, to strike out:

SEC. 10. That to carry into effect the purposes of this act the President is authorized to purchase and provide for the production or manufacture of necessities; to store them and to provide storage facilities for them by construction, purchase, lease, or otherwise; to sell them to any citizen of the United States or to any government engaged in war with any country with which the Government of the United States is or may be at war; and to require any person having the control of any necessaries, or any storage space suitable for the storing of necessaries, to furnish the whole or any part of such necessaries or storage space to the Government in such quantities, at such times, and at such prices as shall be determined by the President to be reasonable. Upon failure of the person to comply with such requirement, the President is authorized to requisition and take possession of any such necessaries or storage space, and to pay for them at the price so determined.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 15, to insert "SEC. 8. That the President is authorized, from time to time, (a) to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or any other public use connected with the common defense, and to requisition storage facilities for such supplies; and he shall ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor"; in line 22, after the word "the," to strike out "price" and insert "compensation"; in line 24, after the word "paid," to insert "75 per cent of"; in the same line, after the word "amount," to strike out "prescribed" and insert "so determined"; on page 11, line 2, after the words "added to," to strike out "the amount so paid" and insert "said 75 per cent"; in line 3, after the word "will," to insert "make up such amount as will"; in the same line, after the word "compensation," to strike out "for such necessities or storage space, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies" and insert "therefore, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code," so as to read:

SEC. 8. That the President is authorized, from time to time, (a) to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or any other public use connected with the common defense, and to requisition storage facilities for such supplies; and he shall ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor. If the compensation so determined be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to require any natural person to furnish to the Government any necessaries held by him and reasonably required for consumption or use by himself and dependents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, on page 11, in line 12, after the word "dependents," to strike out "for a reasonable time" and insert: "nor shall any person, firm, corporation, or association be required to furnish to the Government any seed necessary for the seeding of land owned, leased, or cultivated by them; (b) in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase, in no case paying a less price than the minimum price, if any, fixed in pursuance of this act, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices, foods, feeds, and fuels."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is an amendment to the amendment that the committee wants to insert. I offer the following amendment proposed by the committee on page 11, line 21.

The SECRETARY. After the word "fuels," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed pursuant to the provisions of section 11 of this act, then the price for any feeds or fuels so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to suggest another amendment to subdivision (b). Because of the importance of the subdivision, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he would not be willing that this subdivision should go over until another day. The amendment, I should like to suggest, is to come in after the word "fuels." I think it will come in properly enough before the committee amendment of the Senator from Oregon. In line 21, after the word "fuels," on page 11, I move to insert "or any other of the necessaries described in this act."

Mr. KENYON. I suggested in committee, and several others agreed to it, that the definition of the words "foods, feeds, and fuels" should be stricken out and in lieu thereof the words "necessaries as defined in this act" inserted, and I gave notice that that amendment would be offered on the floor.

Mr. STERLING. That will be perfectly satisfactory and will accomplish exactly the same purpose I had in mind.

Mr. KENYON. I rose to offer that amendment, and it would be briefer than the language suggested by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am willing to accept it so far as I can.

Mr. KENYON. I move, then, if the Senator from South Dekota will permit me——

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. To strike out the words, in line 21, "foods, feeds, and fuels" and insert "necessaries as defined in this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Oregon withhold his amendment for the present?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I withhold my amendment for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask what is the effect of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. KENYON. The effect is very plain. Under this section the purchases made by the Government could only be of food, feed, and fuel. My thought is that there ought to be the same power to buy other things that the farmer might need, instead of merely buying things that the farmer has to sell. I do not see any reason why he should be restricted to buying feed and not buy farm implements, because they are necessary for the use of the farmer.

Mr. STERLING. Then the Senator from Iowa contemplates as necessaries all the articles named in the committee amendment in section 1?

Mr. KENYON. We define necessaries in section 1. The Senate put in a great many things the committee did not, but the committee and the Senate put them in, and whatever the Senate may put in finally and remains there as necessaries, then would come under this definition in section 8.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to suggest as amendatory of the description given by the Senator from Iowa changing the phrase to the term "necessaries"; of course this does not restrict the President in purchasing necessaries of farmers, because necessaries are defined in section 1 now of the act, and practically include everything used by the American people, whether farmers need them or not. I ask the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from South Dakota whether it is their opinion that having substituted the word "necessaries" at that point on page 11, giving the President the power to purchase anything practically that is made by the American people for any purpose to sell it to any person or any group of persons, it is their desire and intention to amend the minimum-price section of the bill, which authorizes the President to fix minimum prices only on nonperishable agricultural products?

Mr. KENYON. Speaking only for myself, it is not my purpose. An amendment will follow the amendment I have now offered. The Senator from Oregon already had proposed to change the phraseology of subsection (b). The President will be authorized under this amendment including all necessaries to purchase anything that may be necessary, but it does not affect the question of a minimum guaranty. That applies only to staples of the farm.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from New York will excuse me, the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa would authorize the purchase at reasonable prices of foods, feeds, and fuels, petroleum, steel, iron, lumber, cotton, and so forth.

Mr. KENYON. Anything that is defined as a necessary in section 1 of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, surely we do not want to do that unless the purpose is just to break the whole bill down and make it ridiculous.

Mr. KENYON. That is not the purpose on my part.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not mean for a moment to intimate that was the purpose of the Senator from Iowa, because he has been the sincere friend of all the best provisions in the bill and one of its warmest advocates. There are things in the bill that I like and am willing to support and there are things stricken out of it that I think are extreme and unreasonable, but there are still some things in the bill I would rather should not be in it.

But, Mr. President, are we serious about providing in a bill that the President of the United States should buy petroleum and the products manufactured from wool and cotton and steel and copper and resell at less than the price at which he bought for the use of the people of the country? We have added wool and cotton and steel and cooper and other products. So literally the bill would provide, if the proposed amendment passes, that practically everything which can be produced shall be bought by the President when the prices are too high and be sold below the prices at which he buys for the benefit of the American people.

Mr. BORAH. It would make Wanamaker ashamed of himself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we can not mean to do that. Let us stop and think just a little about it. Possibly it is excusable to buy foodstuffs and furnish them to the public to save them from starving.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call the Senator's attention to subsection (b), also particularly the attention of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Oregon in charge of the bill, but the Senator from Oregon does not seem to be here just now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He has stepped out for a few moments.

Mr. NORRIS. Section 8, the Senator will note, authorizes the President to requisition food, feed, fuel, and other supplies for the support of the Army and the maintenance of the Navy. Now, what follows all down to subsection (b) pertains to that power given to the President in those first few lines of section 8. Subsection (b), to which the amendment is directed, is a general proposition and has no relation whatever to the Army and to the Navy.

What I want to call attention to is that subsection (b) ought to be an independent section of the bill, if it is in the bill at all, whether this amendment is agreed to or not. Just think of what we are going to put here if we pass it without change. We say in the beginning of the section that the President is authorized to do certain things for the Army and the Navy, and then we go right on in the same section and say without beginning with a capital letter:

in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase—

Now, that is the President—to purchase, in no case paying a less price than the minimum price—

And so forth—

to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices foods, feeds, and fuels,

Does not the Senator think that ought to be cut out of this section or included in such a way with it that we will not be made ridiculous? It seems to me we are providing something for the Army and the Navy here, and then we go right into a general proposition entirely remote and distinct from the power conferred in the beginning of the section.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Answering the Senator, I do not think it would lessen the clearness or the style of the bill to take paragraph (b) out of the place it now occupies and put it in a separate section.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what ought to be done if it stays in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not objecting to that. What I wish to impress upon Senators is that (b) of the section contemplates allowing the President to use the $125,000,000 or $150,000,000 carried in the bill to buy certain things and to resell them for the purpose of breaking prices in the interests of the public—in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase, in no case paying a less price than the minimum price, if any, fixed in pursuance of this act, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices, foods, feeds, and fuels.

Do we mean for a moment, can we seriously consider when we think about it, putting the President in the attitude of buying wool and woolen products, of buying cotton and cotton products, of buying steel and steel products, of buying copper and copper products, of buying lumber and lumber products, and buying them to the extent that it is necessary to control the price and if he finds it necessary to undersell to the public at less than what he paid for all these different commodities——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield; yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he does not think it is something of an undertaking to buy all the wheat in the country and to sell it again, and to buy the fuel and the feed, and if it would add very much to the burden of the President if we regulate the other things?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would.

Mr. KELLOGG. It would not compel him to buy them. I should like to remind the Senator that we appropriated $10,000,000—wisely, I have no doubt—for the Government to buy fertilizer or the products going into the manufacture of fertilizer. It may become necessary, if we are going to protect the farmers of this country, to buy what goes into binding twine, if it be true that there is a trust down in Yucatan somewhere, which is controlling it with American money. If we are going into the buying business I do not know why we should stop with buying the farmers' wheat; make the Government the only purchaser of wheat and let the farmer pay what he is obliged to when he comes to buying his binding twine, fertilizer, and other things.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota desires to present to the Senate an argument against buying anything in this way, I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am inclined to think it would be useless to do it. We are bound to buy the farmer's product, because he has no other market. We closed his market absolutely when we took away every foreign purchaser. We did it with our eyes open; we believed it was necessary in order to carry on this war that the President should have power to control the exports of grain and food from this country to neutral and belligerent countries; yet, nevertheless, when we did it we took away the farmer's market.

Now, we have closed the exchanges, practically, and notice has been served upon the millers and grain dealers of the country that the Government is going to fix the price, and they are therefore afraid to buy anything. The result is that we have no market for the farmer, and we propose to give the Government the power to buy his product and to pay for it whatever the Government pleases. I do not say it is right; economically it is wrong; it illustrates the proposition that whenever the Government goes into business everybody else goes out. But we have been driven into it because we found it necessary to close the markets of Europe to the American farmer. If we are going to give the Government the power—and I think we have got to do it—to take the place of the European market, I do not see any objection to giving the power to the President to buy some of the things that the farmer has got to buy with which to raise his crops. I do not apprehend that the President is going to buy everything named in this bill and sell it to the public; I do not believe he is going to buy anything except wheat, and that because the necessity for doing it has been driven home by the war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Minnesota; and what has he told us? He has told us that the necessity for the Government to buy the products of the farm grows out of the fact that the Government has cut off the market of the farmer, and as the Government has gone into the market everybody else has gone out. Let us follow him to his logical conclusion; when the Government goes in everybody else goes out. Does the Senator want the Government to go in on copper, and everybody else to go out? Does he want the Government to go in on steel, and everybody else to go out? Does he want the Government to go in on wool manufacturing, and everybody else to go out? Does he want the Government to go in on cotton manufacturing, and everybody else to go out? It may be that we have cut off the market of the farmer and therefore must protect the farmer. The Senator thinks so, but if our going in drives everybody else out, let us not go in anywhere that we are not compelled to go in. It would seem dangerous to go in anywhere.

Mr. KELLOGG. But we have gone in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, the Senator's own argument, when we analyze it, demonstrates the want of wisdom of adding here a provision authorizing the Government to go into the market to buy wool and woolen products, cotton and cotton products, steel and steel products, copper and copper products, all sorts of products—everything—and resell. Surely, unless we wish to destroy the bill and contemplate killing it before we get through with it, we shall not add to this part of the bill a provision authorizing the Government to go into the general purchasing business of everything and the resale of everything at lower prices to the consuming public.

Mr. President, it has been hard for me to satisfy myself that I should vote for this bill in any shape; but the bill has been very much improved, I think, by features which have been stricken from it. One of its features that shocked me in its original shape was a little section which would have allowed special agents to go into any man's house and count his eggs, or count his potatoes, or weigh his meat, and say whether he had too much. I still have something of the feeling of the people from whom I descended, who helped to establish our right to have a Government of our own something over a century and a quarter ago; and I would not like anybody, even one representing the Government, to come interfering with the small quantity of foodstuff that may happen to be in my pantry; and I believe that in that my feelings were the feelings of my average fellow citizen; that it would be offensive; that it would be a nuisance to permit such a system, almost amounting to an inquisition. I believe the people of this country would have resented it, and it was entirely unnecessary. I mention that as merely one of a number of things in this crudely prepared bill as it first came to us that aroused my hostility.

I objected also to the provision which looked toward the fixing of the maximum price at which any product of the farm might sell. I believe that such a provision, instead of furnishing the large volume of foodstuffs that we desired, would deter production. I think the bill has been substantially improved by the things which have been cut out of it, and I do not believe it has been much improved by anything that has been put into it.

Mr. REED. The less of it the better; is that the idea of the Senator?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; not quite that. I say the less of the bad the better.

I want to vote for the bill; I want to vote for it as we perfect it; and, if I possibly can, I shall do so. There are a great many people who feel that the bill is going to serve us. The President believes he can do a great deal of good with it. If we cut out the things that to me are shocking, I am willing to give it a chance. We have cut out most of them. As it was originally introduced, I simply could not have pulled myself across the bars and cast my vote for it; but I should be much embarrassed if we added authority to put the Government in the business of buying everything that is found in the United States and reselling it. I am afraid it might break the Treasury if it were really tried. I do not believe the President will allow it; but why should we put it up to him?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to get the Senator's view upon one matter. The Senator states that, as the bill was originally prepared, it had maximum prices for the farmer in it, and that in that form he could not support it. I want to ask him if he does not believe that whoever controls the surplus of a product can practically control the price of the product itself?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ordinarily that would be true. In normal times if we produce a surplus the price of the surplus would practically regulate the price of the great body of the product. Let me go a step further. I do not apprehend any serious depression while the war is going on, certainly in the prices of foodstuffs. I think the demand will so far exceed the supply that it will be practically impossible to prevent the producer from getting a good price.

Mr. REED. Well, let us see about that. There will be no more people in the United States to eat because of the war, will there?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. REED. And if the food-control enthusiasts carry out their scheme all of the people here will eat less?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Answering that, I will say that I do not think that will follow.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not think it amounts to very much?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not as to causing people to eat less. Let me say just here, that one of the provisions in the original bill to which I objected seriously, was what seemed to be the authority for somebody to tell me what I should eat and when I should stop eating. I do not mean simply myself, but I mean everybody. I did not think our country was in a condition where it was necessary for us to allow any representative of any kind of agency whom the President or anybody else named to go into the home and limit the eggs or the biscuits or the bacon or the potatoes that our people should eat.

Mr. GORE. And condemn the farmers' feed corn.

Mr. REED. I really want to get to this one matter, because I am interested in the Senator's opinion, and I am not interested from the standpoint of trying to have an argument or controversy. This is a great question of fact with which we are dealing, and much of it is involved in some uncertainty. It seems to me much of it ought to be pretty clear. It is conceded that there will be no more people to eat in the United States because of the war; no more mouths to feed because of the war. I think it must also be admitted that probably the people of the United States, whether they do it in response to any governmental agency or not, will practice some economy; that in the aggregate there will be a considerable reduction of the amount consumed. I think it must also be conceded there will be a considerable acceleration of production; that that is already manifest in the country; that the farmers have planted more of those things that could be planted since the war began. With those facts before us, it would seem that there ought to be a greater surplus in this country to ship abroad than in normal times, provided we have the average crop. Does not the Senator from Georgia agree to that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I must answer the Senator with a qualification. If the prices of potatoes stay away out of normal figures the quantity of potatoes consumed would probably be less. If the price of any particular commodity is put abnormally high there would be a disposition to refrain from its use. If all prices were put abnormally high it would reduce consumption. If prices are kept normal my own view would be that consumption would be normal in this country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I am only trying to get to this point, and I want to put it in a word. The Senator is a fair man, and a big man, and he wants to solve this question right. Under present conditions, does the Senator not believe that we will create in this country a greater surplus than we would in ordinary times, provided we have average seasons and an average crop?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to make one suggestion for the Senator from Georgia to consider in answering that question. A great many men are taken from industrial enterprises, and the producing force of this country is greatly diminished by the war. That is a point the Senator from Missouri evidently overlooks.

Mr. REED. I am not overlooking that point at all. I think that the places of these men will be taken, and more than taken, by elements of our people who have to a large extent led lives of leisure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think I can answer the Senator in a way which will cover the inquiry he is making, although perhaps not categorically. I hope there will be an increase of production this year; I believe there will be an increase of demand.

Mr. REED. Home demand?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Total demand. I have no hope that we will do more than produce what will be needed for shipment to Great Britain, France, and Italy, and what we will need to keep at home to consume.

Mr. REED. Nobody will claim that. I am trying to get at the home consumption.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To cover the question, to reach an aggregate view of the situation it is necessary to take into consideration the demand which will be placed upon our crop—all of the demand. It would be illogical simply to consider home demand. We have practically embarked on the task of producing a surplus required by those with whom we are engaged in the laudable task of suppressing Prussianism. The Senator's question can not be answered by simply applying it to the United States. It is necessary to embrace the responsibility which will rest upon our food crop, and, taking it as a whole, I have no hope that we will produce all that the demand will call for from us.

Mr. REED. I confess I am a little disappointed in the Senator's answer. I am not discussing the question of or trying to get his opinion about the world demand. I am simply trying to arrive at this proposition, whether, in his opinion, he does not believe there will probably be produced in this country more than we have produced in years past, and whether our local consumption will probably not be somewhat decreased; and, if that is true, whether the surplus to go abroad will not necessarily, to a very large extent, fix the price of the home product, there being no home shortage?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will divide the question and make two answers with reference to it. I believe we will produce this year more than heretofore. I think we will produce largely more of corn. I do not know so much about wheat; but I believe we will produce largely more of potatoes, beans, and that class of foodstuffs called "truck." I think we will produce largely more foodstuffs as a whole than normally.

Now, if there were no Government agency at work supplying the foreign demand, it might be that that surplus going to the ordinary consumer would run down the market price and depress our prices here generally.

Mr. REED. If there were no governmental agency——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If there were no Government agency involved in handling the surplus. If it were simply——

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think that if there were no governmental agency, and our wheat was being sent abroad, there would not be all of the allies and all of the neutrals of the world here bidding for that wheat and running the price up?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. At the present time, yes; certainly. If there were no war going on, and we produced a large excess over a normal crop, and it was simply going to the world to be purchased by individuals and increasing the normal supply in other countries—individuals alone buying—the tendency would be to depress the price of the surplus. What I mean is with the organized forces of four Governments engaged in buying and handling the surplus and with the increased demand abroad I do not look to see the price of the surplus depress the home market.

Mr. REED. That is exactly what I am coming to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will go a step further——

Mr. REED. I am trying to get the Senator simply to admit or state that there probably will be enough raised in this country this year to feed our own people, that there will be a surplus to be sent abroad, and that that surplus will probably be greater than it has been in average years. Now, if that is true, and the market is left open for all the world to bid, there would be but little question that prices would be pretty high.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that is true.

Mr. REED. If all that surplus is to be bought through one agency, does not that agency itself practically control the price of the whole product?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think if all the surplus is bought by one agency, it would largely regulate and control the price of the entire product.

Mr. REED. If you are going to put the farmer in a position where the price of that which he produces is to be regulated, how can it be claimed that he should not, upon the other hand, be protected upon all that he has to buy by similar regulation? How can you escape doing it if you are going to treat him fairly?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The larger part of what he has to buy is not subject to foreign exportation; it is largely a domestic product. The manufactured product that the farmer buys is largely regulated by his own purchases. I am not objecting to protecting him; I am objecting to the Government going into this enormous business, which I regard as impossible for the Government to conduct.

Mr. REED. But, keeping to this text just for a moment, if the Senator will pardon me, I say again I am not trying to argue something for the sake of arguing it. I think this consideration involves the welfare of the farmers of the United States, and I think, if we make a mistake, it will be a ghastly mistake. The Senator says that the farmer is not obliged to buy things as to which there is competition from Europe. Those were not exactly the Senator's words.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. REED. But I am trying to express his view.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said the farmer did not purchase in a market where there was a surplus shipped abroad regulating the price of the commodity that he purchases here.

Mr. REED. I think that is true in normal times, but it is not the case now. For instance, we will take the price of steel. The farmer is to-day paying $7.50 for a shovel plow that cost $2.50 before the war began. The extra cost is occasioned by the foreign demand for steel caused by the war. The farmer is paying an enormous advance on all agricultural implements, because the materials that enter into agricultural implements are in demand by the European nations, and the factories can not supply them fast enough to fill the entire demand of the world. So the farmer has to buy those things in a market that is affected by the market in Europe.

Take the item of shoes which the farmer wears. The price of shoes for our Army before we entered into this war had been run up, I think, from about $1.60 a pair to something like $4.50 to $5 a pair. I do not pretend to quote the figures accurately, but the advance was enormous. Why? Because there was a demand in Europe for shoes and for leather and all the other things entering into shoes. Now, the farmer must buy his shoes, and he must buy them at those world-fixed prices. Take nails, barbed wire, axes, and all sorts of tools that the farmer uses. The price has been similarly advanced by war conditions, by the demand from abroad, either for those tools or other articles of steel which has shortened the supply of steel, so that the price of the tool goes up.

I need not follow that. The farmer consumes just the same as anybody else consumes. Everything that the average man in the United States consumes the farmer has to consume; and he has to consume more than the average man because he is engaged in a business which requires many tools and many implements.

I come back now to the proposition. You propose to take away from the farmer the benefit of the world competition for that which he produces. Are you not, therefore, in fairness, compelled to arrange matters so as to allow him to buy in a market that is similarly controlled? How can you escape it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. REED. I have. The interruption was long, and I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator very candidly. In the first place, I regard food as occupying a different position from anything else. The armies of the United States must be fed; we are engaged in a war in which three other nations which do not produce their own foodstuffs are also engaged upon the same side as ourselves. If we are to win this war, we must provide them with foodstuffs. They must depend principally upon us to raise the foodstuffs which will maintain their armies. In my judgment, to-day the only hope of the Germans is to cut off the food supply of Great Britain and France, and when it is demonstrated that can not be done, I hope to see terms of peace promptly submitted that may be possible of acceptance.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not stop yet; I must answer the Senator from Missouri before I yield. The Senator from Missouri insists, first, that the price of the bulk of the crop will be fixed by the price of the surplus, and his argument is that the contending forces of England, France, and Italy should bid for our food products.

Mr. REED. No; that is not my contention.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The criticism of the Senator was that there was to be one agency buying for all.

Mr. REED. No; let me state it right. The Senator would not put me wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I certainly would not.

Mr. REED. I say that at the present time the farmer sells in a market where world prices prevail. He buys in a market where world prices prevail. If you take away from him the right to sell in the market where world prices prevail, are you not bound, as a matter of justice to him, to protect him, then, against the world prices on that which he buys?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, I understand that the Senator concedes the propriety of eliminating the competition between Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States in buying supplies absolutely essential for the conduct of the war?

Mr. REED. I say that is what is proposed to be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I do not understand that the Senator censures that course. If he does, I wish to say in support of it that it is absolutely essential to the conduct of the war.

Mr. REED. Suppose we take that for granted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is absolutely essential to the conduct of the war that England, France, Italy, and the United States shall not enter into competition in the purchase of the grain and meat needed for their soldiers when the supply is not of a character to stand such competition without prices that would soar to fabulous figures. I believe it is right and just, I believe it is essential as a war measure, to control the subject of purchases by these nations engaged in the war. The Senator says, however, that leaves the farmer without the free market of the world in which to sell, but with the things that he must buy affected by it.

Mr. President, this action does not cut the farmer out of a normal free world market. It cuts him out of an utterly abnormal market, and a market made abnormal by our necessities as a nation at war.

Mr. REED. But, now——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not finished.

Mr. REED. I know the Senator has not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me go on. I am coming to a conclusion with reference to the Senator's views.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So that our situation is one which justifies the action, and the action simply deprives the middle man of the opportunity of selling foodstuffs at fabulous prices, breaking down the Governments with which we are associated, and breaking down our own Nation in its conduct of the war.

Well, having interfered justifiably as a war measure with reference to these purchases, what should we do? We should see to it that the prices of the farmer are kept not only at the figures that they were before the war but at figures which will sustain him in spite of any increased prices for what he has to buy.

Mr. REED. Then that means that the farmer is to be guaranteed a price high enough so that he can afford to pay these excessive prices made by the war upon the things he has to buy. That is where we come to, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is where we come to. I am going one step further before I stop, however.

Mr. REED. And that means that the consumer of the country will be compelled to pay the excessive prices fixed by the war upon all farm products, because the guaranteed price is raised to a level now to make up for all the high prices the farmer must pay, and then the consumer must be compelled to buy all his necessities in a market that has been fixed by war conditions.

The Senator from Georgia and I have stood on the floor of the Senate side by side in a hundred battles, and I think he is one of the fairest men in the world. I put it to him now if that does not bring us right around to the same point with reference to the farmer. If you control the farmer's prices, keeping them down in the market of Europe, and then guarantee him a price high enough so that he can pay all the excessive prices charged to him, have you not gotten back to a position where your guaranteed price has been lifted to a point where it is exactly equal to what it would have been if there had been no guaranteed price?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; not at all.

Mr. REED. How do you escape it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had not finished when the Senator interrupted me. I believe there is much that can be done to check the soaring of other prices without the Government going into the business of buying and reselling. I think many of the increased prices have been due to improper combinations and manipulations. I do not believe that the average increased price of machinery is comparable with what would be the increased price of wheat this fall if we turned England, France, Italy, and the United States all loose upon the market to buy wheat.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not yield to the Senator now. Let me finish what I want to say.

Mr. REED. Surely.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not believe that the increased price of many of the things that the farmer buys is comparable to the price at which there might be no stopping if four great nations, obliged to have wheat from the United States to save their armies, were all struggling for the same wheat. The very high price would be after the farmer had sold, and the speculator would reap the profits.

We put in this bill a provision authorizing the Government to control agricultural implements and fertilizers. What I was objecting to was putting the Government into the business of buying steel and all-steel products to resell them to the public. What I was objecting to was the Government buying all products of the manufactories of wool and cotton and undertaking to sell them back at lower prices to the public. What I was objecting to was the purchase of the products of wool, of cotton, of steel, of copper, of petroleum, of everything, and selling them generally to the public.

If the Senator desires to go further to protect the farmer from exorbitant prices beyond the action with reference to agricultural implements and fertilizers, and he undertakes to shape an amendment of that kind, I shall be glad to discuss it with him when he presents it, but that is a very different proposition from the broad proposition of handling all the products of every kind for all the people of the United States, and it was against that that I rose to speak, supposing that I would hold the floor probably for five minutes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I say to the Senator very frankly what I said many days ago upon the floor of the Senate when the Senator was absent working on the Finance Committee—that I believe a condition exists in the world to-day where it is necessary to prevent a wild scramble for the grains of this country between our people and the various peoples and nations of the earth; that I recognize the fact that the power to control that condition being vested in some one man or one agency is the power to control the prices the farmer may receive, for I maintain that whoever fixes the price of all we have to sell abroad will, in ordinary conditions, fix, or at least approximately fix, the price of that which we have at home.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me interrupt the Senator to suggest this exception: If they absorb and carry abroad so large a portion of our product that there is not the normal supply still to go around at home, the scuffle here at home would produce the same result.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Barring that, I agree with the Senator.

Mr. REED. For if this agent who is to buy for the allies and the neutrals and for our own Government were to buy and ship abroad enough so that our people went hungry, the price would go up; but that, I take it, is unthinkable, and if that were to be attempted I would not be in favor of granting the power.

I think, therefore, that this power must be lodged somewhere. I think it is a very dangerous power. I think it is a power, however, that can be exercised under the Constitution, for I have no doubt of the authority of our Government to control shipments aboard, and that power has already been conferred through the granting of the right to declare an embargo.

That being the case, it being conceded that we must do something to prevent this wild scramble and the draining of our country of its foodstuffs, we ought not to leave the farmer in a position where his price will be held down and controlled in this way, and then when he wants to buy he will be compelled to go into a market and buy where there is the same wild scramble for that which he must have which would exist for his grains if there has been no control established. What I want to get the Senator to help me do is to devise some plan that will protect the farmer so that he will buy in the same kind of market in which he sells; and I do not believe it can be done by guaranteeing a minimum price.

If you put the minimum price at a point high enough to cover all the contingencies, then you have simply made the Government come in and establish here a price for grain that would be as high as the world market without any control whatever. If you put it up to that point, you rob the consumers of the country; you defeat the purpose for which you start out. If you put it below that point, you do an injustice to the farmer. So that it seems to me—and it is pertinent to the question the Senator was discussing—that when you start in to control the farm products of this country, which represent the products of 45,000,000 of our population, you must enter upon a very broad and general control, and I see no escape from it.

It is not enough to put in this bill the power to control these things. There must be imposed the duty to equalize these prices, else who can say where the farmer will end?

When you come to the question——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to the Senator entirely in a few minutes.

Mr. REED. I want to say this in conclusion, and then I will sit down, and I thank the Senator for his great courtesy:

Of course it may be said that food products are essential, and they are; but if we treat the farmer unjustly this year instead of having a great bumper crop planted and harvested next year the farmer will be discouraged and prices will go up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Theoretically the Senator's view might be sound. Practically it is not. It can not at all be contended that the prices of clothing in this country will be affected as the prices of food. There is ample opportunity to produce from our own mills in this country more clothing than our people will wear, and so far as I have been able to observe prices of clothing have not soared. So as to that part of what the farmer buys there has been no change of status to burden him. Now, what else does he buy?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. May not that be true also with regard to the farmer's products? I read this morning in a western paper the statement by a commission merchant of the city of St. Paul that judging from the amount of potatoes planted and the price prevailing now potatoes would sell for 10 cents a bushel. What policy are we to pursue with respect to potatoes?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GRONNA. I wanted to have the Senator's answer as to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator. In the first place, a potato that is capable of being kept can well be given a permanent minimum price. If potatoes have gotten down to 10 cents a bushel or 50 cents a bushel anywhere in the United States, the reduction has not yet reached Washington by a great deal.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that the price of less than a dollar a bushel has reached some of the cities; but this was a statement made by a man who deals very largely in potatoes, and he ventured the suggestion that potatoes would sell in St. Paul at 10 cents a bushel, judging by the number of acres planted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it were certainly true that potatoes were going to sell for 10 cents a bushel, there would not be a great deal of need of any food control. The principal thing we would then need would be a minimum price, to encourage the farmer to produce potatoes next year.

Mr. GRONNA. Then is it not reasonable to suppose, since we have reason to believe that there will not be a surplus of grain, that this bill is for the purpose, and the sole purpose, of fixing a price to the farmer lower than he would receive upon the basis of supply and demand?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In one sense that is undoubtedly true. If the four countries at war—the three with which we are cooperating and the United States—should each go actively into the market to buy grain in competition for their troops, it would be hard to tell where the price of grain would stop.

Mr. GRONNA. Then does not the Senator think it is a discrimination when we say to the farmer, "You shall not be permitted to get the price for your products according to supply and demand, but you must buy in a market and pay the price based upon supply and demand"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I believe that our Government has the right, in view of the condition that confronts it and in view of the fact that it is engaged in war, to obtain, if necessary, what wheat is needed for military purposes at a reasonable price.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. REED rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not yield to either one of the Senators any more. I must conclude.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply want to say that I agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I rose with the idea of speaking five minutes, and others have occupied the floor so long with questions and discussion that it has been almost impossible for me to finish; but I wish to do so.

I believe it entirely legitimate for the Government to requisition the wheat for military purposes; and I think the Government would be justified also in seeing to it that those conducting the war with the United States had the necessary supplies of food for their armies, because the fight is such a common one that to see they are supplied is almost providing our own troops with food.

The real question with which I wanted to close was this: Are you about to do an injustice to the farmer? I hope not. I would certainly be sure that we paid him a good price. I would be unwilling for him to receive anything but a liberal price; but I would cut out the middleman, who, in view of the necessities of our Nation and of the three countries fighting Germany, if not properly called our allies, with whom we are jointly fighting, has been speculating at the expense of our Nation. I would see that the farmer had a good price, a liberal price, as good a price as he ever had for his wheat; but I would get the wheat from him for the Nation without the middleman to pile up the price on us.

With reference to many of the things that the farmer buys the same situation with reference to price does not apply. There is not that acute demand; there is not that excessive demand over supply. The woolen productions of this country, the cotton-mill productions of this country, are ample to meet all the wants of the people. France, England, Italy are not placing any demands upon them. They make what they need for themselves. There is but little that the farmer buys which is run up to an exorbitant price against him. Of course, his sugar is a little higher and his machinery is a little higher. I would see to it that the price he received and the price we pay him for his product was enough to make up to him this extra cost. I certainly would not put our National Government into the business of buying the products of the woolen mill and the products of the cotton mill and undertaking to resell them, because there is no necessity for such a line of conduct. There is no condition which either necessitates it or, in my opinion, excuses it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator from Georgia that he is entirely mistaken in his statement that there has been very little advance in the products the farmer buys. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia and to the Senate that I will take the product of cotton. I will take prints, the cheapest fabrics that are woven. The farmer buys them, and everybody buys them. They have advanced 100 per cent. Prints that were sold over the counter at 5 cents a yard are worth to-day at wholesale more than 10 cents a yard. That is not only true of prints, but it is true of all the products that the farmer has to buy. I do not say that they have all advanced 100 per cent, but I do say that cotton goods in many instances have advanced more than 100 per cent.

Wheat has not advanced more than 100 per cent. Is it not reasonable to believe that the Nation would get the wheat just as well by paying a high price as by paying a low one? No one denies the Government the right to commandeer, to requisition, every bushel of wheat in our country if it is needed for the Army and Navy or for the common defense. We all agree to that; but are you helping production, I ask you, when by law you say to the farmer, "You shall not have the same opportunity that other industries have to get the legitimate price based upon supply and demand, but you shall get a price fixed by law"—not only fixed by law, but a price that has been fixed by some administrator, giving that administrator the right to fix the price? I do not believe that any Senator can justify the statement that it is fair to the farmer to take from him his product at a price less than he would receive under the circumstances.

I asked the Senator from Georgia a moment ago what he would do with respect to potatoes. We know that potatoes are going to be cheap this year. We know that there will be a tremendous overproduction of potatoes. Now, what are we doing for the consumers if we allow the Government of the United States to pay the farmer a larger price for potatoes than he would receive if he took the price based upon supply and demand?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My theory would be to give him a price that would give a normal and fair profit.

Mr. GRONNA. Then would we not do an injustice to the consumer, under the ordinary course of business?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The consumer would be made even by this: Guaranteed against prices at which he could not live, he would pay fair prices at which he could live. The whole theory of the action is to supplant temporarily, on account of the exigencies of war, the normal treatment of the product according to the normal rule of supply and demand and make sure that food may be had at a reasonable price, even though conditions might otherwise let the consumer buy cheaper. The consumer must take his risk of paying more than what might happen to be the price as a return for the surety that he will not be put in a position where he can not buy at a price that will enable him to live. That is about what, I think, would be the effect of it.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator is always frank in his statements, and I agree with him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is only on that theory that it is excusable.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not pleading for the farmers more than for the people engaged in any other industry. I believe that some one should have the right to control all the industries during the war. I do not believe that this war should be allowed to unduly enhance the price of anything; and I believe that some one ought to have the authority fixed by law to regulate the prices not only of farm products but of the products of the factory as well. If that is not done, evidently it will be unfair to the producer, and it will be for the advantage of those who do not come under the provisions of this bill.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEADERS.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives on Senate bill 1811 be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1811) providing for counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Finance Committee I report back favorably with amendments the bill

(H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, and with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass, and I submit a report (No. 75) thereon, which I will have completed in a few days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). The bill reported by the Senator from North Carolina will be placed on the calendar and the report, when completed, will be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection to that, of course, but I wish to ask the Senator if he is not going to have printed an additional number of copies of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am about to submit an order for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be well to state that probably there will also be a minority report filed. I thought it would be just as well to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there will be a minority report filed.

Mr. SIMMONS. As the Senator from Utah indicates, it is possible there will be a minority report. I am not definitely advised as to that, but if any Senator or any number of Senators, who are members of the committee, desire to file a minority report I ask unanimous consent that they may be allowed to file such a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Caroline asks unanimous consent that a minority report may be filed if so desired. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMMONS. I send to the desk an order for the printing of the bill and ask for its immediate consideration.

The order was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 13,000 copies of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. SIMMONS. That provides for the largest number of copies that can be printed for the Senate. I present a concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of 50,000 additional copies and ask for its immediate consideration, if there is no objection.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 8) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed in documeat form 50,000 copies of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, and Senate Report No. 75 thereon, of which 25,000 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 20,000 for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and 2,500 for the use of the Committee on Finance of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Probably the resolution should go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee will report it right back.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be so referred.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question. This is perhaps the most important bill of the whole session. Would there be any objection to having the bill as it has been reported from the committee printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would be very glad to have that done, and I thank the Senator for the suggestion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It will save us great labor in responding to requests.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill as reported may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. With the amendments, of course.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill with the amendments, of course, as reported.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

An act (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, TITLE I.—WAR INCOME TAX.

SECTION 1. That in addition to the normal tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section one of the Act entitled "An Act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like normal tax of two per centum upon the income of every ~~individual~~ individual, a citizen or resident of the United States, received in the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen and every calendar year thereafter.

SEC. 2. That in addition to the additional tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section one of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen and every calendar year thereafter, as follows:

One per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500;

Two per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,500 and does not exceed $10,000;

Three per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,500;

Four per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,500 and does not exceed $15,000;

Five per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $20,000;

Six per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $40,000;

~~Ten~~ Eight per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $60,000;

~~Thirteen and seventy-five one-hundredths~~ Eleven per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $80,000;

~~Seventeen and five tenths~~ Fourteen per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $80,000 and does not exceed $100,000;

~~Twenty-one and twenty-five one-hundredths~~ Seventeen per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000;

~~Twenty-five~~ Twenty per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $200,000;

~~Thirty~~ Twenty-four per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $250,000;

~~Thirty-three and seventy-five one-hundredths~~ Twenty-seven per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $300,000;

~~Thirty-seven and five tenths~~ Thirty per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000;

~~Forty-one and twenty-five one-hundredths~~ Thirty-three per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 ~~and does not exceed $1,000,000~~.

~~Forty-five per centum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.~~

SEC. 3. ~~The~~ That the taxes imposed by sections one and two of this Act shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner as the similar taxes imposed by section one of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, except that in the case of the tax imposed by section one of this Act (a) the exemptions of $3,000 and $4,000 provided in section seven of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, as amended, shall be, respectively, $1,000 and $2,000, ~~instead of $3,000 and $4,000~~, and (b) the returns required under subdivisions (b) and (c) of section eight of such Act as amended shall be required in the case of net incomes of $1,000 or over, in the case of unmarried persons, and $2,000 or over in the case of married persons, instead of $3,000 or over, as therein provided; ~~and (c) the provisions requiring the normal tax of individuals to be deducted and withheld at the source of the income shall not apply to the new two per centum normal tax herein prescribed until on and after January first, nineteen hundred and eighteen, and thereafter shall apply only to incomes exceeding $3,000 as provided in Title I of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen~~.

SEC. 4. That in addition to the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section ten of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, as amended, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like tax of two per centum upon the income received in the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen and every calendar year thereafter, by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, subject to the tax imposed by that subdivision of that section, except that if it has fixed its own fiscal year, the tax imposed by this section for the fiscal year ending during the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid only on that ~~portion~~ proportion of its income ~~for the fiscal year ending during the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen~~ for such fiscal year which the period between January first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, and the end of such fiscal year bears to the whole of such fiscal year.

The tax imposed by this section shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same incomes and in the same manner as the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section ten of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and ~~sixteen~~ sixteen, as amended.

~~SEC. 5. That every individual, corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, that is liable to pay or that has paid the taxes imposed by Title I of such Act of September eighth,~~

~~nineteen hundred and sixteen, upon the net income received in the calendar year nineteen hundred and sixteen, shall pay, in addition to such taxes, a tax equivalent to thirty three and one third per centum of such taxes, to be assessed and collected under the provisions of existing law, and paid on or before September fifteenth, nineteen hundred and seventeen, except that in the case of a corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company, which has fixed its own fiscal year such tax shall be paid within one hundred and sixty five days after the close of the fiscal year ending during the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen.~~

~~SEC. 6. That on and after January first, nineteen hundred and eighteen, individuals, partnerships, withholding agents, corporations, joint stock companies or associations, and insurance companies liable for the payment of income, munitions, or excess profits taxes, under existing law or under this Act, shall pay, without levy, assessment, or notice, simultaneously with the submission of their return of tax, the amount of tax for the payment of which they are shown by such return to be liable. If any tax is not paid at the time when it is due under the provisions of this section, there shall be added (except in the case of an error made in good faith in computing the amount of the tax) the sum of five per centum to the amount of tax unpaid and interest at the rate of one per centum per month upon the amount of such unpaid tax from the time it becomes due. This section shall not apply in the case of any income tax (payable otherwise than by a withholding agent) imposed upon an individual upon whose net income no tax is imposed under subdivision (b) of section one of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, or under section two of this Act.~~

~~SEC. 7. That collectors of internal revenue are authorized to receive uncertified checks in payment of income, munitions, and excess profits taxes, during such time and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; but if a check so received is not paid by the bank on which it is drawn the person by whom such check has been tendered shall remain liable for the payment of the tax and for all legal penalties and additions the same as if such check had not been tendered.~~

SEC. 8 5. That the provisions of this title shall not extend to Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands, and the Porto Rican or Philippine Legislature shall have power by due enactment to amend, alter, modify, or repeal the income tax laws in force in Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands, respectively.

TITLE II.—WAR EXCESS PROFITS TAX.

~~SEC. 200. That in addition to the tax imposed by Title II of the Act entitled "An Act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March third, nineteen hundred and seventeen, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like excess profits tax of eight per centem upon the income received in the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen and every calendar year thereafter by every corporation, joint stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership. Such tax shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid, for the same years, upon the same incomes, upon the same basis, and in the same manner as the tax imposed by Title II of such Act of March third, nineteen hundred and seventeen, as amended by this Act. Income derived from dividends upon stock of other corporations or partnerships which are subject to the tax imposed by this title and Title II of such Act of March third, nineteen hundred and seventeen, shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this title and the tax imposed by Title II of such Act of March third, nineteen hundred and seventeen.~~

~~SEC. 201. That sections two hundred, two hundred and two, and two hundred and four of the Act entitled "An Act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March third, nineteen hundred and seventeen, are hereby amended to read as follows:~~

~~"SEC. 200. That when used in this title—~~

~~"The term 'corporation' includes joint stock companies or associations, and insurance companies:~~

~~"The term 'United States' means only the States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, and the District of Columbia; and~~

~~"The term 'taxable year' means the twelve months ending December thirty first, excepting in the case of a corporation or partnership allowed to fix its own fiscal year, in which case it means such fiscal year. The first taxable year shall be the year ending December thirty first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, except that in the case of a corporation or partnership which has fixed its own fiscal year it shall be the fiscal year ending during the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen."~~

~~"SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stock or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business: Provided, That the good will, including trade marks and trade brands, or the franchise of a corporation or partnership, is not to be included in the actual capital invested, unless the corporation or partnership made payment therefor specifically as such in cash or tangible property, the value of such good will, trade marks, trade brands, or franchise, not to exceed the actual cash or actual value of the tangible property paid therefor at the time of such payment."~~

~~"SEC. 204. That corporations exempt from tax under the provisions of section eleven of Title I of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, and partnerships carrying on or doing the same business shall be exempt from the provisions of this title. In the case of professional partnerships having no substantial capital, the income derived from the professional services of the partners shall be exempt from the provisions of this title. Income derived from dividends upon stock of other corporations or partnerships which are subject to the tax imposed by this title shall be exempt from the provisions of this title."~~

SEC. 200. That when used in this title—

The term "corporation" includes joint stock companies or associations and insurance companies;

The term "domestic" means created under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, or District thereof, and the term "foreign" means created under the laws of any other possession of the United States or of any foreign country or government;

The term "United States" means only the States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, and the District of Columbia;

The term "taxable year" means the twelve months ending December thirty-first, excepting in the case of a corporation or partnership which has fixed its own fiscal year, in which case it means such fiscal year. The first taxable year shall be the year ending December thirty-first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, except that in the case of a corporation or partnership which has fixed its own fiscal year it shall be the fiscal year ending during the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen. If a corporation or partnership, prior to March first, nineteen hundred and eighteen, makes a return covering its own fiscal year, and includes therein the income received during that part of the fiscal year falling within the calendar year nineteen hundred and sixteen, the tax for such taxable year shall be that proportion of the tax computed upon the excess profits during such fiscal year which the time from January first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, to the end of such fiscal year bears to the full fiscal year; and

The term "prewar period" means the calendar years nineteen hundred and eleven, nineteen hundred and twelve, and nineteen hundred and thirteen, or, if a corporation or partnership was not in existence or an individual was not engaged in a trade or business during the whole of such period, then as many of such years during the whole of which the corporation or partnership was in existence or the individual was engaged in the trade or business.

SEC. 201. That in addition to the taxes under existing law and under this Act there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the income of every corporation, partnership, or individual a tax (hereinafter in this title referred to as the tax) equal to the following percentages of the excess profits (determined as hereinafter provided):

Twelve per centum of the amount of such excess profits not in excess of fifteen per centum of the deduction allowed by section two hundred and three, section two hundred and four, or section two hundred and five, as the case may be;

Sixteen per centum of the amount by which such excess profits exceed fifteen per centum of such deduction and do not exceed twenty-five per centum thereof;

Twenty per centum of the amount by which such excess profits exceed twenty-five per centum of such deduction and do not exceed fifty per centum thereof;

Twenty-five per centum of the amount by which such excess profits exceed fifty per centum of such deduction and do not exceed seventy-five per centum thereof;

Thirty per centum of the amount by which such excess profits exceed seventy-five per centum of such deduction and do not exceed one hundred per centum thereof;

Thirty-five per centum of the amount by which such excess profits exceed one hundred per centum of such deduction and do not exceed one hundred and fifty per centum thereof;

Forty per centum of the amount by which such excess profits exceed one hundred and fifty per centum of such deduction and do not exceed two hundred per centum thereof;

Forty-five per centum of the amount by which such excess profits exceed two hundred per centum of such deduction and do not exceed two hundred and fifty per centum thereof; and

Fifty per centum of the amount by which such excess profits exceed two hundred and fifty per centum of such deduction.

For the purposes of this title a corporation or partnership shall be deemed to be engaged in but one trade or business, and all its income shall be deemed to be received from such trade or business.

This title shall apply to all trades or businesses of whatever description (whether continuously carried on or not), including the business of rendering any services for a commission or of acting as an agent of any description, except—

(a) An office or employment, including that of a commercial traveler or agent whose remuneration consists wholly of a fixed and definite sum irrespective of the amount of business done or any other contingency; and

(b) A profession the profits of which depend mainly on the personal qualifications of the individuals by whom such profession is carried on and in which there is not required the investment of more than a nominal capital.

SEC. 202. That the tax shall not be imposed in the case of a trade or business of a domestic corporation or partnership or a citizen or resident of the United States the net income of which trade or business during the taxable year is less than $5,000, or in the case of a trade or business of a foreign corporation or partnership or a nonresident alien individual the net income of which trade or business during such year from sources within the United States is less than the proportion of $5,000 which such net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income, but no exemption shall be allowed to a foreign corporation or partnership or a nonresident alien individual unless a true and accurate return of the entire net income from the trade or business is filed with the collector of internal revenue.

SEC. 203. That for the purposes of this title the amount of excess profits shall be determined, except as otherwise in this title provided—

(a) In the case of a domestic corporation or partnership or of a citizen or resident of the United States by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period; and

(b) In the case of a foreign corporation or partnership or of a nonresident alien individual by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received from sources within the United States during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States during the prewar period.

If the average capital (or in the case of a foreign corporation or partnership or a nonresident alien individual that proportion thereof which the net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income) employed in the trade or business during the taxable year is greater or less than the average capital or proportion thereof so employed during the prewar period, the excess profits shall be determined by deducting from the total net income for the taxable year an amount which bears the same proportion to the average annual net income for the prewar period which the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the taxable year bears to the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the prewar period.

If a taxpayer fails to present satisfactory evidence as to the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period, the excess profits shall be determined as provided in section two hundred and five.

SEC. 204. That if a corporation, partnership, or individual had no net income from the trade or business during the prewar period, or if a corporation or partnership was not in existence or an individual was not engaged in the trade or business, prior to January second, nineteen hundred and thirteen, the amount of the excess profits shall be the same proportion of the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year as the proportion which the excess profits for the same calendar year of representative corporations, partnerships, and individuals, engaged in a like or similar trade or business and whose excess profits are determined as provided in section two hundred and three, bears to the total net income of the trade or business received by such corporations, partnerships, and individuals. In the case of a foreign corporation or partnership or of a nonresident alien individual the net income received from sources within the United States during the taxable year shall be used as the basis of computation.

The proportion between the excess profits and the net income in each trade or business shall be determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in accordance with regulations prescribed by him with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. In the case of a corporation or partnership which has fixed its own fiscal year, the proportion determined for the calendar year ending during such fiscal year shall be used.

A corporation or partnership, although formally organized or reorganized on or after January second, nineteen hundred and thirteen, which is substantially a continuation of a trade or business carried on prior to that date, shall, for the purposes of this title, be deemed to have been in existence prior to that date, and the net income of its predecessor prior to that date shall be deemed to have been its net income.

If the net income of the trade or business for the taxable year, in the case of a corporation or a partnership which was not in existence or of an individual who was not engaged in the trade or business, prior to January second, nineteen hundred and thirteen, is less than six per centum per annum on the average capital employed in such trade or business, there shall be deemed to be no excess profits.

SEC. 205. (a) That if during the prewar period the net income of a domestic corporation or partnership or of a citizen or resident of the United States from a trade or business was less than six per centum per annum on the average capital employed in such trade or business, the excess profits shall be determined either in the same manner as provided in section two hundred and four or by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year an amount equal to six per centum per annum on the average capital employed in such trade or business during such year, at the option of the taxpayer.

(b) If during the prewar period the net income of a foreign corporation or partnership or of a nonresident alien individual from a trade or business carried on within the United States was less than six per centum per annum on that proportion of the entire capital employed in such trade or business which the net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income, the excess profits shall be determined either in the same manner as provided in section two hundred and four or by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year from sources within the United States an amount equal to six per centum per annum on that proportion of the entire average capital employed in such trade or business during such year which the net income of such trade or business from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income of such trade or business.

(c) For the purposes of this title capital shall be deemed to be the fair average value of the assets actually invested and employed in the trade or business less the average amount of the liabilities incurred in respect to such trade or business.

The value of any patent, copyright, trade-mark, or like intangible asset shall not be taken to exceed its cash value at the beginning of the prewar period.

The value of good will and franchises shall not be included except to the extent of actual cash, or the actual cash value of tangible property at the time of payment or exchange thereof, specifically paid or exchanged therefor.

Income of a trade or business arising during the taxable year shall not be included as capital employed during such year.

(d) The tax shall be assessed upon the basis of the excess profits determined as provided in section two hundred and three, but the taxpayer claiming the benefit of this section may at the time of making the return file a claim for abatement of the amount by which the tax so assessed exceeds a tax at like rate computed upon the basis of excess profits determined as provided in this section. In such event collection of the part of the tax covered by such claim for abatement shall not be made until the claim is decided, but if in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the interests of the United States would be jeopardized thereby he may require the claimant to give a bond in such amount and with such sureties as the Commissioner may think wise to safeguard such interests, conditioned for the payment of any tax found to be due, with the interest thereon, and if such bond, satisfactory to the Commissioner, is not given within such time as he prescribes, the full amount of tax assessed shall be collected and the amount overpaid, if any, shall upon final decision of the application be refunded as a tax erroneously or illegally collected.

SEC. 206. That for the purposes of this title net income of a corporation shall be ascertained and returned (a) for the calendar years nineteen hundred and eleven and nineteen hundred and twelve upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided in section thirty-eight of the Act entitled "An Act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August fifth, nineteen hundred and nine; (b) for the calendar year nineteen hundred and thirteen upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided in section II of the Act entitled "An Act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October third, nineteen hundred and thirteen, except that the amounts received by it as dividends upon the stock or from the net earnings of other corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies, subject to the tax imposed by section II of such Act of October third, nineteen hundred and thirteen, shall also be deducted; and (c) for the taxable year upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided in Title I of the Act entitled "An Act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, as amended, except that the amounts received by it as dividends upon the stock or from the net earnings of other corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies, subject to the tax imposed by Title I of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, shall also be deducted.

The net income of a partnership or individual shall be ascertained and returned for the calendar years nineteen hundred and eleven, nineteen hundred and twelve, and nineteen hundred and thirteen and for the taxable year upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided in Title I of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, as amended, except that the credit allowed by subdivision (b) of section five of such Act shall also be deducted. There shall be allowed (a) in the case of a domestic partnership the same deductions as allowed to individuals in subdivision (a) of section five of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, as amended; and (b) in the case of a foreign partnership the same deductions as allowed to individuals in subdivision (a) of section six of such Act as amended.

SEC. 207. That corporations exempt from tax under the provisions of section eleven of Title I of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, as amended, and partnerships and individuals carrying on or doing the same business, or coming within the same description, shall be exempt from the provisions of this title.

SEC. 208. That every partnership having a gross income of $5,000 or more for the taxable year, and every individual having such a gross income from a trade or business shall render a correct return of the income of the trade or business for the taxable year, setting forth specifically the gross income for such year, and the deductions allowed in this title. Such returns shall be rendered at the same time and in the same manner and form as is prescribed for income-tax returns under Title I of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, as amended.

SEC. 209. That all administrative, special, and general provisions of law, including the laws in relation to the assessment, remission, collection, and refund of internal-revenue taxes not heretofore specifically repealed and not inconsistent with the provisions of this title are hereby extended and made applicable to all the provisions of this title and to the tax herein imposed, and all provisions of Title I of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, as amended, relating to returns and payment of the tax therein imposed, including penalties, are hereby made applicable to the tax imposed by this title.

SEC. 210. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make all necessary regulations for carrying out the provisions of this title, and may require any corporation, partnership or individual, subject to the provisions of this title, to furnish him with such facts, data, and information as in his judgment are necessary to collect the tax imposed by this title.

SEC. 211. That Title III (sections three hundred to three hundred and twelve, inclusive) of the Act entitled "An Act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, and Title II (sections two hundred to two hundred and seven, inclusive) of the Act entitled "An Act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March third, nineteen hundred and seventeen, are hereby repealed.

Any amount heretofore or hereafter paid on account of the tax imposed by Title II of such Act of March third, nineteen hundred and seventeen, shall be credited toward the payment of the tax imposed by this title, and if the amount so paid exceeds the amount of such tax the excess shall be refunded as a tax erroneously or illegally collected.

No tax shall be imposed for the taxable year nineteen hundred and seventeen under Title III of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen.

TITLE III.—WAR TAX ON BEVERAGES.

SEC. 300. That on and after the ~~passage~~ enactment of this Act there shall be levied and collected on all distilled spirits in bond at that time or that have been or that may be then or thereafter produced in or imported into the United States, except such distilled spirits as are subject to the tax provided in section three hundred and ~~one~~ four, in addition to the tax now imposed by law, a tax of $1.10 on each proof gallon, or wine gallon when below proof, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon, to be paid by the distiller ~~and imposed~~ or importer when withdrawn, and collected under the provisions of existing law.

That in addition to the tax under existing law there shall be levied and collected upon all perfumes hereafter imported into the United States containing distilled spirits, a tax of $1.10 per wine gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such wine gallon. Such tax shall be collected by the collector of customs and deposited as internal-revenue collections, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

SEC. 301. That in addition to the tax imposed on distilled spirits by existing law and under section three hundred, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid on the materials used in the production of such spirits after the enactment of this Act the following taxes: On all grains, cereals, and other solid products and materials, a tax of $60 per one hundred pounds, and on all molasses, sirups, and other liquid fermentable products and materials, a tax of $5 per wine gallon. Every distiller using any such materials shall keep such records and file such returns and bonds, and the tax shall be paid at such times and in such manner, and subject to such credits, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe or require. Under such rules, regulations, and bonds, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, the provisions of this section shall not apply to materials used in the production of distilled spirits withdrawn exclusively for other than beverage purposes or for the fortification of pure sweet wines as defined by the Act entitled "An Act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen; but such spirits shall not be withdrawn for export except upon the application of an accredited representative of a nation at war with the Imperial German Government, or of any neutral nation, in which application it is declared that such spirits are withdrawn for other than beverage purposes.

SEC. 302. That no distilled spirits produced after the enactment of this Act shall be imported into the United States from any foreign country, or from the West Indian Islands recently acquired from Denmark (unless produced from products the growth of such islands), or from Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands. Under such rules, regulations, and bonds as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the provisions of this section shall not apply to distilled spirits imported for other than beverage purposes.

SEC. 303. That at registered distilleries producing alcohol, or other high-proof spirits, packages may be filled with such spirits reduced to not less than one hundred proof from the receiving cisterns and tax paid without being entered into bonded warehouse. Such spirits may also be transferred from the receiving cisterns at such distilleries, by means of pipe lines, direct to storage tanks in the bonded warehouse and may be warehoused in such storage tanks. Such spirits may be also transferred in tanks or tank cars to general bonded warehouses for storage therein, either in storage tanks in such warehouses or in the tanks in which they were transferred. Such spirits may also be transferred after tax payment from receiving cisterns or warehouse storage tanks to tanks or tank cars and may be transported in such tanks or tank cars to the premises of rectifiers of spirits. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby empowered to prescribe all necessary regulations relating to the drawing off, transferring, gauging, storing and transporting of such spirits; the records to be kept and returns to be made; the size and kind of packages and tanks to be used; the marking, branding, numbering, and stamping of such packages and tanks; the kinds of stamps, if any, to be used; and the time and manner of paying the tax; the kind of bond and the penal sum of same. The tax prescribed by law must be paid before such spirits are removed from the distillery premises, or from general bonded warehouse in the case of spirits transferred thereto, except as otherwise provided by law.

Under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, distilled spirits may hereafter be drawn from receiving cisterns and deposited in distillery warehouses without having affixed to the packages containing the same distillery warehouse stamps, and such packages, when so deposited in warehouse, may be withdrawn therefrom on the original gauge where the same have remained in such warehouse for a period not exceeding thirty days from the date of deposit.

SEC. ~~301~~ 304. That upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the tax now imposed by law has been paid, and which, on the day this Act is ~~passed~~ enacted, are held by a retailer in a quantity in excess of fifty gallons in the aggregate, or by any other person, corporation, partnership, or association in any quantity, (whether in the original condition or mixed or combined with any other article), and which are intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of $1.10 on each proof gallon, ~~or wine gallon when below proof,~~ and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof ~~or wine~~ gallon: Provided, That the tax on such distilled spirits in the custody of a court of bankruptcy in insolvency proceedings ~~at the time of the passage of this Act~~ on June first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, shall be paid by the person to whom the court delivers such distilled spirits at the time of such ~~delivery,~~ delivery, to the extent that the amount thus delivered exceeds the fifty gallons hereinbefore provided.

SEC. ~~302~~ 305. That in addition to the tax now imposed or imposed by this Act on distilled spirits there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of 15 cents on each ~~wine~~ proof gallon and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such ~~wine~~ proof gallon on all distilled spirits or wine hereafter rectified, purified, or refined in such manner, and on all mixtures hereafter produced in such manner, that the person so rectifying, purifying, refining, or mixing the same is a rectifier within the meaning of section thirty-two hundred and forty-four, Revised Statutes, as amended, and on all such articles in the possession of the rectifier on the day this Act is ~~passed~~ enacted: Provided, That this tax shall not apply to gin produced by the redistillation of a pure spirit over juniper berries and other aromatics.

When the process of rectification is completed and the tax prescribed by this section has been paid, it shall be unlawful for the rectifier or other dealer to reduce in proof or increase in volume such spirits or wine by the addition of water or other substance; nothing herein contained shall, however, prevent a rectifier from using again in the process of rectification spirits already rectified and upon which the tax has theretofore been paid.

The tax imposed by this section shall not attach to cordials or liqueurs on which a tax is imposed and paid under the Act entitled "An Act to increase the revenue and for other purposes," approved September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, nor to the mixing and blending of wines, where such blending is for the sole purpose of perfecting such wines according to commercial standards, nor to blends made exclusively of two or more pure straight whiskies aged in wood for a period not less than four years and without the addition of coloring or flavoring matter or any other substance than pure water and if not reduced below ninety proof: Provided, That such blended whiskies shall be exempt from tax under this section only when compounded under the immediate supervision of a revenue officer, in such tanks and under such conditions and supervision as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

All distilled spirits taxable under this section shall be subject to uniform regulations concerning the use thereof in the manufacture, blending, compounding, mixing, marking, branding, and sale of whisky and rectified spirits, and no discrimination whatsoever shall be made by reason of a difference in the character of the material from which same may have been produced.

The business of a rectifier of spirits shall be carried on, and the tax on rectified spirits shall be paid, under such rules, regulations, and bonds as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be fined not less than ~~$500 and~~ $250 and not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years. He shall, in addition, be liable to double the tax evaded, the same to be recovered, together with the tax, on any bond given by him as rectifier.

SEC. 306. That hereafter collectors of internal revenue shall not furnish wholesale liquor dealer's stamps in lieu of and in exchange for stamps for rectified spirits unless the package covered by stamp for rectified spirits is to be broken into smaller packages.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to discontinue the use of the following stamps whenever in his judgment the interests of the Government will be subserved thereby:

Distillery warehouse, special bonded warehouse, special bonded rewarehouse, general bonded warehouse, general bonded retransfer, transfer grapes, export tobacco, export cigars, export oleomargarine and export fermented liquor stamps.

SEC. 307. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to require at distilleries, breweries, rectifying houses, and wherever else in his judgment such action may be deemed advisable, the installation of meters, tanks, pipes, or any other apparatus for the purpose of protecting the revenue, and such meters, tanks, and pipes and all necessary labor incident thereto shall be at the expense of the person, corporation, partnership, or association on whose premises the installation is required. Any such person, corporation, partnership, or association refusing or neglecting to install such apparatus when so required by the commissioner shall not be permitted to conduct business on such premises.

SEC. ~~303~~ 308. That on and after the ~~passage~~ enactment of this Act there shall be levied and collected on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquor, containing one-half per centum or more of alcohol, brewed or manufactured and sold, or stored in warehouse, or removed for consumption or sale, within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, in addition to the tax now imposed by law, a tax of $1.25 for every barrel containing not more than thirty-one gallons, and at a like rate for any other quantity or for the fractional parts of a barrel authorized and defined by law.

SEC. 309. That from and after the enactment of this Act taxable fermented liquors may be conveyed without payment of tax from the brewery premises where produced to a contiguous industrial distillery of either class established under the Act of October third, nineteen hundred and thirteen, to be used as distilling material, and the residue from such distillation containing not to exceed one-half of one per centum of alcohol by volume, which is to be used in making beverages may be manipulated by cooling, flavoring, carbonating, settling, and filtering on the distillery premises or elsewhere.

The removal of the taxable fermented liquor from the brewery to the distillery and the operation of the distillery and removal of the residue therefrom shall be under the supervision of such officer or officers as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall deem proper, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make such regulations from time to time as may be necessary to give force and effect to this section and to safeguard the revenue.

SEC. ~~304~~ 310. That upon all still wines, including vermuth, and upon all champagne and other sparkling wines, liqueurs, cordials, artificial or imitation wines or compounds sold as wine, except still wines containing not more than fourteen per centum of absolute alcohol, hereafter produced in or imported into the United States, and removed from the custom-house, place of manufacture, or from bonded premises for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax equal to such tax, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law. Upon still wines containing not more than fourteen per centum of absolute alcohol there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such wines, a tax equal to one-half such tax, to be levied, collected and paid under the provisions of existing law~~, and the tax imposed by existing law and the additional tax herein imposed shall apply to all domestic or imported liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds by whatever name sold or offered for sale and without reference to the kind of spirits or wines used in the manufacture thereof.~~

Whoever has possession of any empty cask or package which has been used for wine or any article taxable under this section or under subdivision (a) or (e) of section four hundred and two of the Act entitled "An Act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, and on which the stamp or any mark denoting payment of tax has not been effectually destroyed or obliterated, or reuses any such cask or package, having thereon any such stamp or mark previously so used, shall for each such offense be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and all such casks or packages, and their contents in the case of reuse, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. ~~305~~ 311. That upon all articles specified in section three hundred and ~~four~~ ten upon which the tax now imposed by law has been paid and which are on the day this Act is ~~passed~~ enacted held in excess of twenty-five gallons in the aggregate of such articles and intended for sale, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax equal to the tax now imposed by law.

SEC. ~~306~~ 312. That upon all grape brandy or wine spirits withdrawn by a producer of wines from any fruit distillery or special bonded warehouse under subdivision (c) of section four hundred and two of the Act entitled "An Act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in addition to the tax therein imposed, a tax equal to such tax, to be assessed, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

SEC. ~~307~~ 313. ~~Upon~~ That upon all sweet wines held for sale by the producer thereof upon the day this Act is ~~passed~~ enacted there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid an additional tax equivalent to 10 cents per proof gallon upon the grape brandy or wine spirits used in the fortification of such wine, and an additional tax of 10 cents per proof gallon shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon all grape brandy or wine spirits withdrawn by a producer of sweet wines for the purpose of fortifying such wines and not so used prior to the ~~passage~~ enactment of this Act.

SEC. ~~308~~ 314. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid—

SEC. ~~309~~ 315. That each such manufacturer, producer, bottler, or importer shall make monthly returns under oath to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located the principal place of business, containing such information necessary for the assessment of the tax, and at such times and in such manner, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

SEC. 316. That upon all carbonic acid gas in drums or other containers (intended for use in the manufacture or production of carbonated water or other drinks) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of 5 cents per pound. Such tax shall be paid by the purchaser to the vendor thereof and shall be collected, returned, and paid to the United States by such vendor in the same manner as provided in section five hundred and three.

TITLE IV.—WAR TAX ON CIGARS, TOBACCO, AND MANUFACTURES THEREOF.

SEC. 400. That upon cigars and cigarettes, which shall be manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the taxes now imposed by existing law, the following taxes, to be paid by the manufacturer or importer thereof: (a) On cigars of all descriptions made of tobacco, or any substitute therefor, and weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, 25 cents per thousand; (b) on cigars made of tobacco, or any substitute therefor, and weighing more than three pounds per thousand, if manufactured or imported to retail at ~~not more than~~ 4 cents or more each, ~~50 cents per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 4 cents,~~ and not more than ~~6~~ 7 cents each, $1 per thousand; (c) if manufactured or imported to retail at more than ~~6~~ 7 cents each and not more than ~~10~~ 15 cents each, ~~$2~~ $3 per thousand; (d) if manufactured or imported to retail at more than ~~10~~ 15 cents each and not more than ~~15~~ 20 cents each, $5 per thousand; (e) if manufactured or imported to retail at more than ~~15 cents and not more than~~ 20 cents each, ~~$5~~ $7 per thousand; ~~if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 20 cents and not more than 25 cents each, $7 per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 25 cents each, $10 per thousand~~: Provided, That the word "retail" as used in this section shall mean the ordinary retail price of a single cigar, and that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, by regulation, require the manufacturer or importer to affix to each box or container a conspicuous label indicating ~~the maximum retail price of each cigar~~ by letter the clause of this section under which the cigars therein contained have been tax-paid, which must correspond with the tax-paid stamp on said box or container; (f) on cigarettes made of tobacco, or any substitute therefor, made in or imported into the United States, and weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, ~~$1.25~~ 75 cents per thousand; weighing more than three pounds per thousand, $1.20 per thousand.

~~The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall provide the dies and stamps for cigars and cigarettes necessary under the taxes in effect, and the sizes of packages authorized, after the provisions of this title take effect.~~

Every manufacturer of cigarettes (including small cigars weighing not more than three pounds per thousand) shall put up all the cigarettes and such small cigars that he manufactures or has manufactured for him, and sells or removes for consumption or use, in packages or parcels containing five, ~~seven~~, eight, ~~nine~~, ten, twelve, ~~fourteen~~, fifteen, sixteen, ~~eighteen, nineteen~~ twenty, twenty-four, forty, fifty, eighty, or one hundred cigarettes each, and shall securely affix to each of said packages or parcels a suitable stamp denoting the tax thereon and shall properly cancel the same prior to such sale or removal for consumption or use under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and all cigarettes imported from a foreign country shall be packed, stamped, and the stamps canceled in a like manner, in addition to the import stamp indicating inspection of the customhouse before they are withdrawn therefrom.

SEC. 401. That upon all tobacco and snuff hereafter manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or use, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax ~~equal to such tax~~ of 4 cents per pound, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

In addition to the packages provided for under existing law, manufactured tobacco and snuff may be put up and prepared by the manufacturer for sale or consumption, in packages of the following description: Packages containing one-eighth, three-eighths, five-eighths, seven-eighths, one and one-eighth, one and three-eighths, one and five-eighths, one and seven-eighths, and five ounces.

SEC. 402. That so much of section four hundred as imposes a tax upon cigars, and the whole of section four hundred and one, shall take effect ~~thirty~~ ten days after the ~~passage~~ enactment of this Act. That section four hundred and four and so much of section four hundred as imposes a tax upon cigarettes and as relates to packages or parcels in which cigarettes may be put up shall take effect ~~ninety~~ ten days after the ~~passage~~ enactment of this Act~~: Provided, That after the passage of this Act and before the expiration of the aforesaid ninety days, cigarettes may be put up in the packages now provided for by law or in the packages provided for in section four hundred~~.

SEC. 403. That there shall also be ~~assessed~~ levied and collected, upon all manufactured tobacco and snuff in excess of one ~~thousand~~ hundred pounds at any one place of business ~~or~~ and upon cigars in excess of five hundred at any one place of business ~~or~~ and upon cigarettes in excess of ~~twenty~~ one thousand at any one place of business, which were manufactured or imported, and removed from factory or ~~customs-house~~ custom-house prior to the ~~passage~~ enactment of this Act, bearing tax-paid stamps affixed to such articles for the payment of the taxes thereon, and which are, on the day this Act is ~~passed~~ enacted, held and intended for sale by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, and upon all manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, or cigarettes, removed from factory or ~~customs-house~~ custom-house after the ~~passage~~ enactment of this Act but prior to the time when the tax imposed by section four hundred or section four hundred and one upon such articles takes effect, an additional tax equal to one-half the tax imposed by such sections upon such articles.

SEC. 404. That there shall be ~~levied~~ levied, assessed, and collected upon cigarette paper made up into packages, books, sets, or tubes, made up in or imported into the United States and intended for use by the smoker in making cigarettes the following taxes: On each package, book, or set, ~~containing not more than twenty-five papers, one-fourth of 1 cent;~~ containing more than twenty-five but not more than fifty papers, one-half of 1 cent; containing more than fifty but not more than one hundred papers, 1 cent; containing more than one hundred papers, 1 cent for each one hundred papers or fractional part thereof; and upon tubes, 2 cents for each one hundred tubes or fractional part thereof. ~~Such tax shall be paid by stamps affixed by the person, corporation, partnership, or association making up or importing such package, book, set, or tube.~~

TITLE V.—WAR TAX ON FACILITIES FURNISHED BY PUBLIC UTILITIES~~, AND INSURANCE~~.

SEC. 500. That from and after the first day of ~~June~~ ——————, nineteen hundred and seventeen, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid (a) a tax equivalent to three per centum of the amount paid for the transportation by rail or water or by any form of mechanical motor power when in competition with carriers by rail or water of property by freight consigned from one point in the United States to another; (b) ~~a tax equivalent to six per centum of the amount paid for the transportation of property by express companies consigned from one point in the United States to another~~ a tax of 1 cent for each 25 cents, or fraction thereof, paid to any person, corporation, partnership, or association, engaged in the business of transporting parcels or packages by express over regular routes between fixed terminals, for the transportation of any package, parcel, or shipment by express from one point in the United States to another: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the carrier paying such tax to list separately in any bill of lading, freight receipt, or other similar document, the amount of the tax herein levied, if the total amount of the freight and tax be therein stated; (c) a tax equivalent to ~~ten~~ five per centum of the amount paid for the transportation of persons by rail or water, or by any form of mechanical motor power when in competition with carriers by rail or water, ~~within the United States~~ from one point in the United States to another or to any point in Canada or Mexico, where the ticket therefor is sold or issued in the United States, not including the amount paid for commutation or season tickets for trips less than ~~thirty~~ forty miles, or for transportation the fare for which does not exceed ~~25~~ 35 cents, and a tax equivalent to ~~ten~~ five per centum of the amount paid for seats, berths, and state-rooms in parlor cars, sleeping cars, or on vessels. If a ticket or mileage book used for such transportation or accommodation has been purchased before this section takes effect, or if cash fare be paid, the tax imposed by this section shall be collected from the person presenting the ticket or mileage book, or paying cash fare, by the conductor or other agent, when presented for such transportation or accommodation, and the amount so collected shall be paid to the United States in such manner and at such times as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, but this tax shall not apply to tickets, other than mileage books, bought and partially used before this section goes into effect; (d) a tax equivalent to five per centum of the amount paid for the transportation of oil by pipe line; ~~(e) a tax equivalent to five per centum of the amount paid for electric power for domestic uses, and of the amount paid for light or heat service, and a tax equivalent to five per centum of the amount paid for telephone service by subscribers, exclusive of the amounts paid for toll or long distance calls; (f)~~ (e) a tax of 5 cents upon each telegraph, telephone, or radio, dispatch, message, or conversation, which originates ~~at any office, station, or exchange,~~ within the United States, ~~of any telegraph or telephone line, which is transmitted over such line,~~ and for the transmission of which a charge of 15 cents or more is imposed: Provided, That only one payment of such tax shall be required, notwithstanding the lines or stations of one or more persons, corporations, partnerships, or associations shall be used for the transmission of such dispatch, message, or conversation.

SEC. 501. That the taxes imposed by section five hundred shall be paid by the person, corporation, partnership, or association paying for the services or facilities rendered.

In case ~~a~~ the carrier ~~by rail, water, or pipe line~~ does not, because of its ownership of the commodity transported, or for any other reason, receive the amount which as a carrier it would otherwise charge, such carrier shall pay a tax equivalent to the tax which would be imposed upon the transportation of such commodity if the carrier received payment for such transportation: Provided, That in case of a carrier which on May first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, had no rates or tariffs on file with the proper Federal or State authority, the tax shall be computed on the basis of the rates or tariffs of other carriers for like services as ascertained and determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Provided further, That nothing in this or the preceding section shall be construed as imposing a tax (a) upon the transportation of any commodity which is necessary for the use of the carrier in the conduct of its business as such and is intended to be so used or has been so used; or (b) upon the transportation of company material transported by one carrier, which constitutes a part of a railroad system, for another carrier which is also a part of the same system; or (c) upon movements by railroad companies of the outfit, property, and persons of any amusement company, which, in the conduct of its business, owns and provides its rolling stock and equipment and which is not engaged in the transportation of commodities for sale or exchange; or (d) upon the amount paid for special mileage books issued under transportation contract to such amusement companies and used for the transportation of its bona fide employees and agents.

SEC. 502. That no tax shall be imposed under section five hundred upon any payment received for services rendered to ~~officers or employees of the United States, or of any State or political subdivision thereof, in the course of their official business~~ the United States, or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this section shall be evidenced in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

SEC. 503. That each person, corporation, partnership, or association receiving any payments referred to in section five hundred shall collect the amount of the tax, if any, imposed by such section from the person, corporation, partnership, or association making such payments, and shall make monthly returns under oath, in duplicate, and pay the taxes so collected and the taxes imposed upon it under paragraph two of section five hundred and one to the collector of internal revenue of the district in which the principal office or place of business is located. Such returns shall contain such information, and be made in such manner, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

~~(a) Life insurance: A tax equivalent to 8 cents on each $100 or fractional part thereof of the amount for which any life is insured under any policy of insurance, or other instrument, by whatever name the same is called: Provided, That on all policies for life insurance only by which a life is insured not in excess of $500, issued on the industrial or weekly payment plan of insurance, the tax shall be forty per centum of the amount of the first weekly premium: Provided further, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this subdivision;~~

~~(b) Marine, inland, and fire insurance: A tax equivalent to 1 cent on each dollar or fractional part thereof of the premium charged under each policy of insurance or other instrument by whatever name the same is called whereby insurance is made or renewed upon property of any description (including rents or profits), whether against peril by sea or inland waters, or by fire or lightning, or other peril: Provided, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this subdivision;~~

~~(c) Casualty insurance: A tax equivalent to 1 cent on each dollar or fractional part thereof of the premium charged under each policy of insurance or obligation of the nature of indemnity for loss, damage, or liability (except bonds taxable under subdivision two of schedule A of Title VIII) issued or executed or renewed by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, transacting the business of employer's liability, workmen's compensation, accident, health, tornado, plate glass, steam boiler, elevator, burglary, automatic sprinkler, automobile, or other branch of insurance (except life insurance, and insurance described and taxed in the preceding subdivision): Provided, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this subdivision;~~

~~(d) Policies issued by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, whose income is exempt from taxation under Title I of the Act entitled "An Act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, shall be exempt from the taxes imposed by this section.~~

~~SEC. 505. That every person, corporation, partnership, or association, issuing policies of insurance upon the issuance of which a tax is imposed by section five hundred and four, shall, within the first fifteen days of each month, make a return under oath, in duplicate, and pay such tax to the collector of internal revenue of the district in which the principal office or place of business of such person, corporation, partnership, or association is located. Such returns shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.~~

TITLE VI.—WAR ~~TAX ON MANUFACTURES~~ EXCISE TAXES.

SEC. 600. ~~That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid—~~

~~(a) Upon all automobiles, automobile trucks, automobile wagons, and motorcycles, and automobile, motorcycle, or bicycle tires (including inner tubes) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer a tax equivalent to five per centum of the price for which so sold: Provided, That from the tax which otherwise would be imposed upon a manufacturer, producer, or importer of automobiles, automobile trucks, automobile wagons, or motorcycles there shall be deducted an amount equivalent to 5 per centum of the amount paid for the tires, including inner tubes, on such vehicles by such manufacturer, producer, or importer; and~~

(a) That on the day this Act takes effect, and thereafter on July first in each year, and also at the time of the original purchase of a new automobile or motorcycle by a user, if on any other date than July first, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, upon the use of automobiles and motorcycles not used exclusively for business, an excise tax at basic rates as follows: Motorcycles, $2.50; automobiles, the original listed retail price of which is not over $500, $5; original listed retail price over $500 and not over $750, $7.50; original listed retail price over $750 and not over $1,000, $10; and for each further increase of $500 or fractional part thereof of original listed retail price, an additional tax of $5.

In the case of a tax imposed at the time of the original purchase of a new automobile or motorcycle on any other date than July first, the amount to be paid shall be the same number of twelfths of the amount of the tax as the number of calendar months, including the month of sale, remaining prior to the following July first.

The tax payable in any year shall be reduced by ten per centum of its basic amount for each twelve months elapsed since the original sale of the automobile or motorcycle by the manufacturer or importer, but in no case shall it be reduced to less than fifty per centum of such basic amount.

~~(b) Upon all musical instruments sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer for more than $10 each, and upon piano players, graphophones, phonographs, talking machines, and records used in connection with any musical instruments, piano player, graphophone, phonograph, or talking machine, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to five per centum of the price for which so sold, and~~

SEC. 804. That whenever an adhesive stamp is used for denoting any tax imposed by this title, except as hereinafter provided, the ~~person~~ person, corporation, partnership, or association using or affixing the same shall write or stamp or cause to be written or stamped thereupon the initials of his or its name and the date upon which the same is attached or used, so that the same may not again be used: Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe such other method for the cancellation of such stamps as he may deem expedient. ~~Whoever fraudulently makes use of an adhesive stamp to denote any tax imposed by this title without so effectually canceling and obliterating such stamp, except as before mentioned, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $500, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.~~

~~SEC. 805. That whenever the stamp required by law has not been affixed to any instrument at the proper time, any party having an interest therein and subsequently desirous of affixing such stamp to said instrument, or, if said instrument be lost, to a copy thereof, may appear before the collector of internal revenue of the proper district, who shall, upon the payment of the price of the proper stamp and of a penalty of $10, and, where the whole amount of the tax denoted by the stamp required shall exceed the sum of $50, on payment also of interest, at the rate of six per centum, on said tax from the day on which such stamp ought to have been affixed, affix the proper stamp to such instrument or copy, and note upon the margin thereof the date of his so doing and the fact that such penalty has been paid; and the same shall thereupon be deemed and held to be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if stamped when made or issued: Provided further, That where it shall appear to said collector, upon oath or otherwise, to his satisfaction, that any such instrument has not been duly stamped, at the time of making or issuing the same, by reason of accident, mistake, inadvertence, or urgent necessity, and without any willful design to defraud the United States of the stamp, or to evade or delay the payment thereof, then and in such case, if such instrument, or, if the original be lost, a copy thereof, duly certified by the officer having charge of any record in which such original is required to be recorded, or otherwise duly proven to the satisfaction of the collector, shall, within twelve calendar months after the making or issuing thereof, be brought to the said collector of internal revenue to be stamped, and the stamp tax chargeable thereon shall be paid, the said collector may remit the penalty aforesaid and cause such instrument to be duly stamped.~~

SEC. ~~805~~ 805. (a) That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared and distributed for the payment of the taxes prescribed in this title suitable stamps denoting the tax on the document, articles, or thing to which the same may be affixed, and shall prescribe such method for the affixing ~~and cancellation~~ of said stamps in substitution for or in addition to the method provided in this title, as he may deem expedient. ~~The Commissioner of Internal Revenue,~~

(b) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to procure any of the stamps provided for in this title by contract whenever such stamps can not be speedily prepared by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; but this authority shall expire on the first day of January, nineteen hundred and eighteen, except as to imprinted stamps furnished under contract, authorized by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. ~~The adhesive stamps used in the payment of the tax levied in Schedule A of this title shall be furnished for sale by the several collectors of internal revenue, who shall sell and deliver them at their face value to all persons applying for the same, except officers or employees of the Internal Revenue Service: Provided, That such collectors may sell and deliver such stamps in quantities of not less than $100 of face value, with a discount of one per centum, except as otherwise provided in this title.~~

(c) All internal-revenue laws relating to the assessment and collection of taxes are hereby extended to and made a part of this title, so far as applicable, for the purpose of collecting stamp taxes omitted through mistake or fraud from any instrument, document, paper, writing, parcel, package, or article named herein.

SEC. ~~807~~ 806. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall furnish to the Postmaster General without prepayment a suitable quantity of adhesive stamps to be distributed to and kept on sale by the various postmasters in the United States. ~~Each~~ The Postmaster General may require each such postmaster ~~shall be held accountable under his official~~ to give additional or increased bond as postmaster for the value of the stamps so furnished, and each such postmaster shall deposit the receipts from the sale of such stamps to the credit of and render accounts to the Postmaster General at such times and in such forms as he may by regulations prescribe. The Postmaster General shall at least once monthly transfer all collections from this source to the Treasury as internal-revenue collections: ~~Provided, That adhesive stamps shall be sold by postmasters at their face value without discount.~~

SEC. ~~808~~ 807. That the collectors of the several districts shall furnish without prepayment to any assistant treasurer or designated depositary of the United States located in their respective collection districts a suitable quantity of adhesive stamps for sale. In such cases the collector may require a bond, with sufficient sureties, to an amount equal to the value of the adhesive stamps so furnished, conditioned for the faithful return, whenever so required, of all quantities or amounts undisposed of, and for the payment monthly of all quantities or amounts sold or not remaining on hand. ~~The collectors shall supply their deputies with a sufficient quantity of such stamps and may sell to other parties within their respective districts who may make application therefor adhesive stamps upon the same terms allowed by law or under the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is hereby authorized to make such other regulations, not inconsistent herewith, for the security of the United States and the better accommodation of the public, in relation to the matters hereinbefore mentioned, as he may judge necessary and expedient.~~ The Secretary of the Treasury may ~~also~~ from time to time make such regulations as he may find necessary to insure the safe-keeping or prevent the illegal use of all such adhesive stamps.

SCHEDULE A.—STAMP TAXES.

1. Bonds of indebtedness: Bonds, debentures, or certificates of indebtedness issued on and after the first day of ~~June~~ ————, nineteen hundred and seventeen, by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 5 cents: Provided, That every renewal of the foregoing shall be taxed as a new issue: Provided further, That when a bond conditioned for the repayment or payment of money is given in a penal sum greater than the debt secured, the tax shall be based upon the amount secured.

~~2. Bonds, indemnity and surety: Bonds for indemnifying any person, corporation, partnership, or corporation who shall have become bound or engaged as surety, and all bonds for the due execution or performance of any contract, obligation, or requirement, or the duties of any office or position, and to account for money received by virtue thereof, and all other bonds of any description, except such as may be required in legal proceedings, not otherwise provided for in this schedule, 50 cents: Provided, That where a premium is charged for the execution of such bond the tax shall be paid at the rate of one per centum on each dollar or fractional part thereof of the premium charged: Provided further, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this subdivision.~~

2. Parcel-post packages: Upon every parcel or package transported from one point in the United States to another by parcel post, a tax of 1 cent for each 25 cents or fractional part thereof charged for such transportation, to be paid by the consignor.

No such parcel or package shall be transported until a stamp or stamps representing the tax due shall have been affixed thereto.

3. Capital stock, issue: On each original issue, whether on organization or reorganization, of certificates of stock by any association, company, or corporation, on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 5 cents: Provided, That where capital stock is issued without face value, the tax shall be 5 cents per share, unless the actual value is in excess of $100 per share, in which case the tax shall be 5 cents on each $100 of actual value or fraction thereof.

The stamps representing the tax imposed by this ~~paragraph~~ subdivision shall be attached to the stock books and not to the certificates issued.

4. Capital stock, sales or transfers: On all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales or deliveries of, or transfers of legal title to shares or certificates of stock in any association, company, or corporation, whether made upon or shown by the books of the association, company, or corporation, or by any assignment in blank, or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or other evidence of transfer or sale, whether entitling the holder in any manner to the benefit of such stock or not, on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 2 cents, and where such shares ~~or certificates~~ of stock are without par value, the tax shall be 2 cents on the transfer or sale or agreement to sell on each share ~~or certificate~~, unless the actual value thereof is in excess of $100 per share, in which case the tax shall be 2 cents on each $100 of actual value or fraction thereof: Provided, That it is not intended by this title to impose a tax upon an agreement evidencing a deposit of stock certificates as collateral security for money loaned thereon, which stock certificates are not actually sold, nor upon such stock certificates so deposited: Provided further, That the tax shall not be imposed upon deliveries or transfers to a broker for sale, nor upon deliveries or transfers by a broker to a customer for whom and upon whose order he has purchased same, but such deliveries or transfers shall be accompanied by a certificate setting forth the facts: Provided further, That in case of sale where the evidence of transfer is shown only by the books of the company the stamp shall be placed upon such books; and where the change of ownership is by transfer of the certificate the stamp shall be placed upon the certificate; and in cases of an agreement to sell or where the transfer is by delivery of the certificate assigned in blank there shall be made and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill or memorandum of such sale, to which the stamp shall be affixed; and every bill or memorandum of sale or agreement to sell before mentioned shall show the date thereof, the name of the seller, the amount of the sale, and the matter or thing to which it refers. Any person or persons liable to pay the tax as herein provided, or anyone who acts in the matter as agent or broker for such person or persons who shall make any such sale, or who shall in pursuance of any such sale deliver any stock or evidence of the sale of any stock or bill or memorandum thereof, as herein required, without having the proper stamps affixed thereto with intent to evade the foregoing provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

5. Produce, sales of, on exchange: Upon each sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, including so-called transferred or scratch sales, any products or merchandise at any exchange, or board of trade, or other similar place, for future delivery, for each $100 in value of the merchandise covered by said sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell, 2 cents, and for each additional $100 or fractional part thereof in excess of $100, 2 cents: Provided, That on every sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell as aforesaid there shall be made and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, to which there shall be affixed a lawful stamp or stamps in value equal to the amount of the tax on such sale: Provided further, That sellers of commodities described herein, having paid the tax provided by this subdivision, may transfer such contracts to a clearing house corporation or association, and such transfer shall not be deemed to be a sale, or agreement of sale, or an agreement to sell within the provisions of this Act, provided that such transfer shall not vest any beneficial interest in such clearing house association but shall be made for the sole purpose of enabling such clearing house association to adjust and balance the accounts of the members of said clearing house association on their several contracts. And every such bill, memorandum, or other evidence of sale or agreement to sell shall show the date thereof, the name of the seller, the amount of the sale, and the matter or thing to which it refers; and any person or persons liable to pay the tax as herein provided, or anyone who acts in the matter as agent or broker for such person or persons, who shall make any such sale or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, or who shall, in pursuance of any such sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, deliver any such products or merchandise without a bill, memorandum, or other evidence thereof as herein required, or who shall deliver such bill, memorandum, or other evidence of sale, or agreement to sell, without having the proper stamps affixed thereto, with intent to evade the foregoing provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

That no bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, in case of cash sales of products or merchandise for immediate or prompt delivery which in good faith ~~is~~ are actually intended to be delivered shall be subject to this tax.

6. Drafts or checks payable otherwise than at sight or on demand, promissory notes, except bank notes issued for circulation, ~~and for each renewal of the same,~~ for a sum not exceeding $100, 2 cents; and for each additional $100 or fractional part thereof, 2 cents.

7. Bank check, draft, or certificate of deposit not drawing interest, or order for the payment of any sum of money, drawn upon or issued by any bank, trust company, or any person or persons, companies, or corporations at sight or on demand, if drawn or issued for any amount in excess of $5, 1 cent.

~~7~~ 8. Conveyance: Deed, instrument, or writing, whereby any lands, tenements, or other realty sold shall be granted, assigned, transferred, or otherwise conveyed to, or vested in, the purchaser or purchasers, or any other person or persons, by his, her, or their direction, when the consideration or value of the interest or property conveyed, exclusive of the value of any lien or encumbrance remaining thereon at the time of sale, exceeds $100 and does not exceed $500, 50 cents; and for each additional $500 or fractional part thereof 50 cents: Provided, That nothing contained in this paragraph shall be so construed as to impose a tax upon any instrument or writing given to secure a debt.

~~8~~ 9. Entry of any goods, wares or merchandise at any ~~customhouse~~ custom-house, either for consumptiom or warehousing, not exceeding $100 in value, 25 cents; exceeding $100 and not exceeding $500 in value, 50 cents; exceeding $500 in value, $1.

(c) Upon all crude cocoa produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 3 cents per pound, and upon all prepared or manufactured cocoa and chocolate mported and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 5 cents per pound, such taxes to be paid by the producer or importer;

(d) Upon (1) all refined sugar refined or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, and (2) all sugar manufactured or imported, if suitable for consumption as an article of human food without further refining, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of one-half cent per pound, to be paid by the refiner, manufacturer, or importer;

(e) Upon all saccharine or similar products, glucose, grape sugar, sirup of cane juice, and molasses, produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of $2.50 per pound in the case of saccharine or similar products, one-fourth of a cent per pound in the case of glucose and grape sugar, 1 cent per gallon in the case of molasses (except beet molasses) and sirup of cane juice, testing by polariscope above forty degrees and not above fifty-six degrees, and 2 cents per gallon in the case of molasses and sirup of cane juice testing above fifty-six degrees, such taxes to be paid by the producer or importer.

Only one tax under this section shall be paid with respect to any article, irrespective of change of form by manufacture or other process.

SEC. 901. That each such manufacturer, producer, refiner, or importer shall make monthly returns under oath to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located the principal place of business containing such information necessary for the assessment of the tax, and at such times and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

Upon the removal from the custody of customs officials of articles subject to a tax imposed by section nine hundred, the tax shall be collected by the collector of customs and deposited as internal-revenue collections under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

SEC. 902. That so much of paragraph O of section IV of the Act entitled "An Act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October third, nineteen hundred and thirteen, as authorizes a drawback upon sugar is hereby repealed.

TITLE ~~XI~~ X.—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS.

SEC. ~~1109~~ 1000. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid in the United States, upon articles coming into the United States from the West Indian Islands acquired from Denmark, a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the United States upon like articles of domestic manufacture; such articles shipped from said islands to the United States shall be exempt from the payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of said islands: Provided, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid in said islands, upon articles imported from the United States, a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in said islands upon like articles there manufactured; and such articles going into said islands from the United States shall be exempt from payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

SEC. ~~1101~~ 1001. That all administrative, special, or stamp provisions of law, including the law relating to the assessment of taxes, so far as applicable, are hereby extended to and made a part of this Act, and every person, corporation, partnership, or association liable to any tax imposed by this Act, or for the collection thereof, shall keep such records and render, under oath, such statements and returns, and shall comply with such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may from time to time prescribe.

SEC. ~~1102~~ 1002. That where additional taxes are imposed by this Act upon articles or commodities, upon which the tax imposed by existing law has been paid, the person, corporation, partnership, or association required by this Act to pay the tax shall, within thirty days after its enactment, make return under oath in such form and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe. ~~The tax shown to be due by such return shall be collected by assessment, and paid on or before November first, nineteen hundred and seventeen.~~ Payment of the tax shown to be due may be extended to a date not exceeding four months from the enactment of this Act, upon the filing of a bond for payment in such form and amount and with such sureties as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

SEC. ~~1103~~ 1003. ~~In~~ That in all cases where the method of collecting the tax imposed by this Act is not specifically provided, the tax shall be collected in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. All administrative and penalty provisions of Title VIII of this Act, in so far as applicable, shall apply to the collection of any tax which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue determines or prescribes shall be paid by stamp.

SEC. ~~1104~~ 1004. That whoever fails to make any return required by this Act or the regulations made under authority thereof within the time prescribed or who makes any false or fraudulent return, and whoever evades or attempts to evade any tax imposed by this Act or fails to collect or truly to account for and pay over any such tax, shall be subject to a penalty of not more than $1,000, or to imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court, and in addition thereto a penalty of double the tax evaded, or not collected, or accounted for and paid over, to be assessed and collected in the same manner as taxes are assessed and collected, in any case in which the punishment is not otherwise specifically provided.

SEC. ~~1105~~ 1005. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this Act.

SEC. ~~1106~~ 1006. That where the rate of tax imposed by this Act, payable by stamps, is an increase over previously existing rates, stamps on hand in the collectors' offices and in the Bureau of Internal Revenue may continue to be used until the supply on hand is exhausted, but shall be sold and accounted for at the rates provided by this Act, and assessment shall be made against manufacturers and other taxpayers having such stamps on hand on the day this Act takes effect for the difference between the amount paid for such stamps and the tax due at the rates provided by this Act.

SEC. ~~1107~~ 1007. That (a) if any person, corporation, partnership, or association has prior to May ninth, nineteen hundred and seventeen, made a bona fide contract with a dealer for the sale, after the tax takes effect, of any article ~~(or, in the case of moving picture films, such a contract with a dealer, exchange, or exhibitor, for the sale or lease thereof)~~ upon which a tax is imposed under Title III, IV, VI, or ~~X~~ IX, or under subdivision ~~thirteen~~ fourteen of Schedule A of Title VIII, or under this section, and (b) if such contract does not permit the adding of the whole of such tax to the amount to be paid under such contract, then the vendee ~~or lessee~~ shall, in lieu of the vendor ~~or lessor,~~ pay so much of such tax as is not so permitted to be added to the contract price.

The taxes payable by the vendee ~~or lessee~~ under this section shall be paid to the vendor ~~or lessor~~ at the time the sale ~~or lease~~ is consummated, and collected, returned, and paid to the United States by such vendor ~~or lessor~~ in the same manner as provided in section five hundred and three.

The term "dealer" as used in this section includes a vendee who purchases any article with intent to use it in the manufacture or production of another article intended for sale.

SEC. ~~1108~~ 1008. That in the payment of any tax under this Act not payable by stamp a fractional part of a cent shall be disregarded unless it amounts to one-half cent or more, in which case it shall be increased to one cent.

SEC. 1009. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may, under regulations prescribed by him with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, require all internal-revenue taxpayers, who are required by law to render returns, to pay without prior levy, assessment, or notice, and at the same time as the return is required to be made, any such internal-revenue tax, any provision of law fixing any other time as the time when such tax is due to the contrary notwithstanding. All penalties provided by existing law for failure to render return and pay tax when due are hereby made applicable to any failure to pay the tax at the time required by such regulations.

SEC. 1010. That collectors of internal revenue are authorized to receive uncertified checks in payment of income and excess profits taxes, during such time and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; but if a check so received is not paid by the bank on which it is drawn the person by whom such check has been tendered shall remain liable for the payment of the tax and for all legal penalties and additions the same as if such check had not been tendered.

TITLE ~~XII~~ XI.—POSTAL RATES AND WAR TAX ON PROFITS OF PUBLICATIONS.

SEC. ~~1200~~ 1100. That on and after thirty days after the enactment of this Act the rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class, except postal cards and private mailing or post cards, shall ~~ten days after the passage of this Act~~ be, in addition to the existing rate, 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof: Provided, That the rate of postage on drop letters of the first class shall be ~~2 cents an ounce or fraction thereof. Postal cards, and private mailing or post cards when complying with the requirements of existing law, shall be transmitted through the mails at 1 cent each in addition to the existing rate~~ the same as under existing law.

~~SEC. 1201. That on and after July first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, the zone system applicable to parcel post shall apply to mail matter of the second class, and (a) from that date until November first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, the rate of postage shall be as follows, except as hereinafter provided: 1½ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the first zone, 1⅔ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the second or third zone, 1⅔ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the fourth or fifth zones, 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the sixth zone, 2⅓ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the seventh zone, and 2⅔ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the eighth zone, and (b) from November first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, until March first, nineteen hundred and eighteen, the rate of postage shall be as follows, except as hereinafter provided: 1⅓ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the first zone, 1⅔ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the second or third zone, 2⅔ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the fourth or fifth zone, 3 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the sixth zone, 3⅓ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the seventh zone, and 4⅓ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the eighth zone, and (c) after March first, nineteen hundred and eighteen, the rate of postage shall be as follows, except as hereinafter provided: 1⅓ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the first zone, 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the second or third zone, 3 cents a pound or fraction thereof, when for delivery within the fourth or fifth zone, 4 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the sixth zone, 5 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the seventh zone, and 6 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the eighth zone.~~

SEC. 1101. That on and after thirty days after the enactment of this Act the rate of postage on all mail matter of the second class shall be, in addition to the existing rate, one-fourth of a cent per pound or fraction thereof.

SEC. ~~1202~~ 1102. That the rate of postage on daily newspapers, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, shall be the same as now provided by law; and nothing in this title shall affect existing law as to free circulation and existing rates on second-class mail matter within the county of publication: Provided, ~~That the Postmaster-General may hereafter require publishers to separate or make up to zones in such a manner as he may direct all mail matter of the second class when offered for mailing~~.

~~SEC. 1203. That in the case of newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second class matter and maintained by and in the interest of religious, educational, scientific, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations or associations, not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, the second class postage rates shall be, irrespective of the zone in which delivered (except when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, in which case the rates shall be the same as now provided by law), 1¼ cents a pound or fraction thereof from July first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, until March first, nineteen hundred and eighteen, and thereafter 1½ cents a pound or fraction thereof. The publishers of such newspapers and periodicals before being entitled to the foregoing rates shall furnish to the Postmaster General, at such times and under such conditions as he may prescribe, satisfactory evidence that none of the net income of such organization inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.~~

~~SEC. 1204. That where the total weight of any one edition or issue of any publication mailed to any one zone does not exceed one pound, the rate of postage shall be 1 cent for each eight ounces or fraction thereof.~~

~~SEC. 1205. The rates provided by this title shall relate to the entire bulk mailed to any one zone and not to individually addressed packages.~~

SEC. ~~1206~~ 1103. That where a newspaper or periodical is mailed by other than the publisher or his agent or a news agent or dealer, the rate shall be the same as now provided by law.

SEC. ~~1207~~ 1104. That the Postmaster General, on or before the tenth day of each month, shall pay into the general fund of the Treasury an amount equal to the difference between the estimated amount received during the preceding month for the transportation of first and second class matter through the mails and the estimated amount which would have been received under the provisions of the law in force at the time of the ~~passage~~ enactment of this Act.

SEC. ~~1208~~ 1105. That the salaries of postmasters at offices of the first, second, and third classes shall not be increased after ~~July~~ ——— first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, during the existence of the present war. The compensation of postmasters at offices of the fourth class shall continue to be computed on the basis of the present rates of postage, unless compensation be less than that received during the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and seventeen, in which case such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the rates of postage provided for in this Act, but in no case shall the compensation so computed be greater than that received during such fiscal year.

SEC. 1106. That in addition to the taxes under existing law and under this Act there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, for the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen and each calendar year thereafter, upon the net income of every individual, corporation, partnership, or association arising from the publication of newspapers, magazines, or periodicals, entitled to be entered as second-class mail matter (whether or not so entered), a tax of five per centum of the amount of such net income in excess of $4,000.

For the purposes of this section net income shall be determined upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided in Title I of the Act entitled "An Act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, in so far as such title is applicable. The provisions of section four of this Act with respect to a tax for a fiscal year ending during the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen shall also apply to the tax imposed by this section upon a corporation or partnership.

TITLE XII.—INCOME TAX AMENDMENTS.

SEC. 1200. That subdivision (a) of section two of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) That, subject only to such exemptions and deductions as are hereinafter allowed, the net income of a taxable person shall include gains, profits, and income, derived from salaries, wages, or compensation for personal service of whatever kind and in whatever form paid, or from professions, vocations, businesses, trade, commerce, or sales, or dealings in property, whether real or personal, growing out of the ownership or use of or interest in real or personal property, also from interest, rent, dividends, securities, or the transaction of any business carried on for gain or profit, or gains or profits and income derived from any source whatever: Provided, That the term "dividends" as used in this title shall be held to mean any distribution made or ordered to be made by a corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, out of its earnings or profits accrued since March first, nineteen hundred and thirteen, and payable to its shareholders, whether in cash or in stock of the corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, which stock dividend shall be considered income, to the amount of the earnings or profits so distributed: Provided further, That dividends declared and paid in the year nineteen hundred and seventeen, or subsequent tax years, shall be deemed to have been paid from the net income of the year in which paid or from the most recently accumulated surplus, and shall constitute a part of the annual income of the shareholder for the respective years in which earned by the corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, and shall be taxed to the shareholder at the rate prescribed by law for such years."

SEC. 1201. (1) That paragraphs second and third of subdivision (a) of section five of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Second. All interest paid within the year on his indebtedness except on indebtedness incurred for the purchase of obligations or securities the interest upon which is exempt from taxation as income under this title;

"Third. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and excess profits taxes) or of its Territories, or possessions, or any foreign country, or by the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, not including those assessed against local benefits;"

(2) Subdivision (c) of section five of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 1202. That (1) paragraphs second and third of subdivision (a) of section six of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Second. The proportion of all interest paid within the year by such person on his indebtedness (except on indebtedness incurred for the purchase of obligations or securities the interest upon which is exempt from taxation as income under this title) which the gross amount of his income for the year derived from sources within the United States bears to the gross amount of his income for the year derived from all sources within and without the United States, but this deduction shall be allowed only if such person includes in the return required by section eight all the information necessary for its calculation;

"Third. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and excess profits taxes), or of its Territories, or possessions, or by the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, paid within the United States, not including those assessed against local benefits;"

(2) Subdivision (b) of section six of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(b) There shall also be allowed the same credit as specified in subdivision (b) of section five, and likewise a credit for the amount of income, the normal tax on which has been paid or withheld for payment at the source of the income under the provisions of this title."

(3) Section six of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is also further amended by adding a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(c) A nonresident alien individual shall receive the benefit of the deductions and credits provided for in this section only by filing or causing to be filed with the collector of internal revenue a true and accurate return of his total income, received from all sources, corporate or otherwise, in the United States, in the manner prescribed by this title; and in case of his failure to file such return the collector shall collect the tax on such income, and all property belonging to such nonresident alien individual shall be liable to distraint for the tax."

SEC. 1203. (1) That section seven of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That for the purpose of the normal tax only, there shall be allowed as an exemption in the nature of a deduction from the amount of the net income of each citizen or resident of the United States, ascertained as provided herein, the sum of $3,000, plus $1,000 additional if the person making the return be a head of a family or a married man with a wife living with him, or plus the sum of $1,000 additional if the person making the return be a married woman with a husband living with her; but in no event shall this additional exemption of $1,000 be deducted by both a husband and a wife: Provided, That only one deduction of $4,000 shall be made from the aggregate income of both husband and wife when living together: Provided further, That if the person making the return is the head of a family there shall be an additional exemption of $200 for each child dependent upon such person, if under eighteen years of age, or if incapable of self-support because mentally or physically defective, but this provision shall operate only in the case of one parent in the same family: Provided further, That guardians or trustees shall be allowed to make this personal exemption as to income derived from the property of which such guardian or trustee has charge in favor of each ward or cestui que trust: Provided further, That in no event shall a ward or cestui que trust be allowed a greater personal exemption than $3,000, or, if married, $4,000, as provided in this section, from the amount of net income received from all sources. There shall also be allowed an exemption from the amount of the net income of estates of deceased citizens or residents of the United States during the period of administration or settlement, and of trust or other estates of citizens or residents of the United States the income of which is not distributed annually or regularly under the provisions of subdivision (b) of section two, the sum of $3,000, including such deductions as are allowed under section five."

(1) Subdivision (b) of section seven of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 1204. (1) That subdivisions (c) and (e) of section eight of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) Guardians, trustees, executors, administrators, receivers, conservators, and all persons, corporations, or associations, acting in any fiduciary capacity, shall make and render a return of the income of the person, trust, or estate for whom or which they act, and be subject to all the provisions of this title which apply to individuals. Such fiduciary shall make oath that he has sufficient knowledgee of the affairs of such person, trust, or estate to enable him to make such return and that the same is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, true and correct, and be subject to all the provisions of this title which apply to individuals: Provided, That a return made by one of two or more joint fiduciaries filed in the district where such fiduciary resides, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, shall be a sufficient compliance with the requirements of this paragraph: Provided further, That no return of income not exceeding $3,000 shall be required except as in this title otherwise provided.

"(e) Persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for income tax only in their individual capacity, and the share of the profits of the partnership to which any taxable partner would be entitled if the same were divided, whether divided or otherwise, shall be returned for taxation and the tax paid under the provisions of this title: Provided, That from the net distributive interests on which the individual members shall be liable for tax, normal and additional, there shall be excluded their proportionate shares received from interest on the obligations of a State or any political or taxing subdivision thereof, and upon the obligations of the United States and its possessions, and that for the purpose of computing the normal tax there shall be allowed a credit, as provided by section five, subdivision (b), for their proportionate share of the profits derived from dividends. Such partnership, when requested by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or any district collector, shall render a correct return of the earnings, profits, and income of the partnership, except income exempt under section four of this Act, setting forth the item of the gross income and the deductions and credits allowed by this title, and the names and addresses of the individuals who would be entitled to the net earnings, profits, and income, if distributed. A partnership shall have the same privilege of fixing and making returns upon the basis of its own fiscal year as is accorded to corporations under this title. The share of the profits of a partnership to which any taxable partner would be entitled for a fiscal year ending in nineteen hundred and sixteen, or subsequent tax years for which the rates of tax have been or shall be changed by law, shall be returned for taxation and the tax paid under the respective rates applicable to each calendar year in the proportion that the period of each calendar year bears to the full fiscal year."

(2) Subdivision (d) of section eight of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 1205. (1) That subdivisions (b), (f), and (g) of section nine of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"(b) All persons, corporations, partnerships, associations, and insurance companies, in whatever capacity acting, including lessees or mortgagors of real or personal property, trustees acting in any trust capacity, executors, administrators, receivers, conservators, employers, and all officers and employees of the United States, having the control, receipt, custody, disposal, or payment of interest, rent, salaries, wages, premiums, annuities, compensation, remuneration, emoluments, or other fixed or determinable annual or periodical gains, profits, and income of any nonresident alien individual, other than income derived from dividends on capital stock, or from the net earnings of a corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, which is taxable upon its net income as provided in this title, are hereby authorized and required to deduct and withhold from such annual or periodical gains, profits, and income such sum as will be sufficient to pay the normal tax imposed thereon by this title, and shall pay the amount withheld to the officer of the United States Government authorized to receive the same; and they are each hereby made personally liable for such tax, and they are each hereby indemnified against every person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company, or demand whatsoever for all payments which they shall make in pursuance and by virtue of this title.

"(f) All persons, corporations, partnerships, or associations, undertaking as a matter of business or for profit the collection of foreign payments of interest or dividends by means of coupons, checks, or bills of exchange shall obtain a license from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and shall be subject to such regulations enabling the Government to obtain the information required under this title, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and whoever knowingly undertakes to collect such payments as aforesaid without having obtained a license therefor, or without complying with such regulations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and for each offense be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"(g) The tax herein imposed upon gains, profits, and incomes not falling under the foregoing and not returned and paid by virtue of the foregoing or as otherwise provided by law shall be assessed by personal return under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. The intent and purpose of this title is that all gains, profits, and income of a taxable class, as defined by this title, shall be charged and assessed with the corresponding tax, normal and additional, prescribed by this title, and said tax shall be paid by the owner of such income, or the proper representative having the receipt, custody, control, or disposal of the same. For the purpose of this title ownership or liability shall be determined as of the year for which a return is required to be rendered.

The provisions of this section relating to the deduction and payment of the tax at the source of income shall only apply to the normal tax hereinbefore imposed upon nonresident alien individuals."

(2) Subdivisions (c), (d), and (e) of section nine of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 1206. (1) That the first paragraph of section ten of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. (a) That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually upon the total net income received in the preceding calendar year from all sources by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, organized in the United States, no matter how created or organized, but not including partnerships, a tax of two per centum upon such income; and a like tax shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually upon the total net income received in the preceding calendar year from all sources within the United States by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, organized, authorized, or existing under the laws of any foreign country, including interest on bonds, notes, or other interest-bearing obligations of residents, corporate or otherwise, and including the income derived from dividends on capital stock or from net earnings of resident corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies, Whose net income is taxable under this title: Provided, That the term 'dividends' as used in this title shall be held to mean any distribution made or ordered to be made by a corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, out of its earnings or profits accrued since March first, nineteen hundred and thirteen, and payable to its shareholders, Whether in cash or in stock of the corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, Which stock dividend shall be considered income, to the amount of the earnings or profits so distributed: Provided further, That dividends declared and paid in the year nineteen hundred and seventeen, or subsequent tax years, shall be deemed to have been paid from the net income of the year in which paid or from the most recently accumulated surplus, and shall constitute a part of the annual income of the shareholder for the respective years in which earned by the corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, and shall be taxed to the shareholder at the rate prescribed by law for such years."

(2) Section ten of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby further amended by adding a new subdivision as follows:

"(b) In addition to the income tax imposed by subdivision (a) of this section there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually an additional tax of fifteen per centum upon the amount, remaining undistributed sixty days after the end of each calendar or fiscal year, of the total net income of every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, received during the year, as determined for the purposes of the tax imposed by such subdivision (a), but including the amount allowed as a credit under subdivision (d) of section twelve."

The tax imposed by this subdivision shall not apply to—

(1) That portion of the undistributed profits used for the establishment or maintenance of reserves required by law, or

(2) That portion of the undistributed profits of railroads used, with the express approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or, if not subject to the jurisdiction of such commission, with the express approval of the State or local authorities having jurisdiction over such expenditure, for extensions, renewals, or betterments, or

(3) An amount of the undistributed profits equal to twenty per centum of such net income of corporations, or joint-stock companies or associations (not including railroads), directly engaged in the production or distribution of commodities or in banking, but only while and to the extent that such exempted amount is derived from such activities, and so employed: Provided, That if any portion of such exempted amount at any time ceases to be so employed and is not distributed, a tax shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in respect thereto at the same rate as would have been imposed if such amount had not been so employed during the year in which earned: Provided further, That not more than one of the exemptions in clauses (1), (2), and (3) of this subdivision shall be allowed to the same taxpayer.

The foregoing tax rate shall apply to the undistributed net income received by every taxable corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company in the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen and in each year thereafter, except that if it has fixed its own fiscal year under the provisions of existing law, the foregoing rate shall apply to the proportion of the taxable undistributed net income returned for the fiscal year ending prior to December thirty-first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, which the period between January first, nineteen hundred and seventeen, and the end of such fiscal year bears to the whole of such fiscal year.

SEC. 1207. (1) That paragraphs third and fourth of subdivision (a) of section twelve of such act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Third. The amount of interest paid within the year on its indebtedness (except on indebtedness incurred for the purchase of obligations or securities the interest upon which is exempt from taxation as income under this title) to an amount of such indebtedness not in excess of the sum of (a) the entire amount of the paid-up capital stock outstanding at the close of the year, or, if no capital stock, the entire amount of capital employed in the business at the close of the year, and (b) one-half of its interest-bearing indebtedness then outstanding: Provided, That for the purpose of this title preferred capital stock shall not be considered interest-bearing indebtedness, and interest or dividends paid upon this stock shall not be deductible from gross income: Provided further, That in cases wherein shares of capital stock are issued without par or nominal value, the amount of paid-up capital stock, within the meaning of this section, as represented by such shares, will be the amount of cash, or its equivalent, paid or transferred to the corporation as a consideration for such shares: Provided further, That in the case of indebtedness wholly secured by property collateral, tangible or intangible, the subject of sale or hypothecation in the ordinary business of such corporation, joint-stock company or association as a dealer only in the property constituting such collateral, or in loaning the funds thereby procured, the total interest paid by such corporation, company, or association within the year on any such indebtedness may be deducted as a part of its expenses of doing business, but interest on such indebtedness shall only be deductible on an amount of such indebtedness not in excess of the actual value of such property collateral: Provided further, That in the case of bonds or other indebtedness, which have been issued with a guaranty that the interest payable thereon shall be free from taxation, no deduction for the payment of the tax herein imposed, or any other tax paid pursuant to such guaranty, shall be allowed; and in the case of a bank, banking association, loan or trust company, interest paid within the year on deposits or on moneys received for investment and secured by interest-bearing certificates of indebtedness issued by such bank, banking association, loan or trust company;

"Fourth. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and excess-profits taxes), or of its Territories, or possessions, or any foreign country, or by the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, not including those assessed against local benefits."

(2) Paragraphs third and fourth of subdivision (b) of section twelve of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Third. The amount of interest paid within the year on its indebtedness (except on indebtedness incurred for the purchase of obligations or securities the interest upon which is exempt from taxation as income under this title) to an amount of such indebtedness not in excess of the proportion of the sum of (a) the entire amount of the paid-up capital stock outstanding at the close of the year, or, if no capital stock, the entire amount of the capital employed in the business at the close of the year, and (b) one-half of its interest-bearing indebtedness then outstanding, which the gross amount of its income for the year from business transacted and capital invested within the United States bears to the gross amount of its income derived from all sources within and without the United States: Provided, That in the case of bonds or other indebtedness which have been issued with a guaranty that the interest payable thereon shall be free from taxation, no deduction for the payment of the tax herein imposed or any other tax paid pursuant to such guaranty shall be allowed; and in case of a bank, banking association, loan or trust company, or branch thereof, interest paid within the year on deposits by or on moneys received for investment from either citizens or residents of the United States and secured by interest-bearing certificates of indebtedness issued by such bank, banking association, loan or trust company, or branch thereof;

"Fourth. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and excess-profits taxes), or of its Territories, or possessions, or by the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, paid within the United States, not including those assessed against local benefits."

(3) Section twelve of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby further amended by adding a new subdivision as follows:

"CREDITS.

(d) For the purpose of the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section ten, the income embraced in a return of a corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company shall be credited with the amount received as dividends upon the stock or from the net earnings of any other corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, which is taxable upon its net income as provided in this title, less that proportion of such amount which the amount received by the distributing corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company from similar sources bears to the entire net income of such distributing corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company."

SEC. 1208. (1) That subdivision (c) of section thirteen of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) All the provisions of this title relating to the tax authorized and required to be deducted and withheld and paid to the officer of the United States Government authorized to receive the same from the income of nonresident alien individuals from sources within the United States shall be made applicable to the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section ten upon incomes derived from interest upon bonds and mortgages or deeds of trust or similar obligations of domestic or other resident corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies by nonresident alien firms, copartnerships, companies, corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies, not engaged in business or trade within the United States and not having any office or place of business therein."

(2) Subdivision (f) of section thirteen of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen is hereby repealed.

SEC. 1209. That section eighteen of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That any person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company, liable to make a return or to supply information required under this title, who refuses or neglects to make such return or to supply such information at the time or times herein specified in each year, shall be liable, except as otherwise specially provided in this title, to a penalty of not less than $20 nor more than $1,000. Any individual or any officer of any corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company, required by law to make, render, sign, or verify any return or to supply any information, who makes any false or fraudulent return or statement with intent to defeat or evade the assessment required by this title to be made, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $2,000 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court, with the costs of prosecution: Provided, That where any tax heretofore due and payable has been duly paid by the taxpayer, it shall not be re-collected from any withholding agent required to retain it at its source, nor shall any penalty be imposed or collected in such cases from the taxpayer, or such withholding agent whose duty it was to retain it, for failure to return or pay the same, unless such failure was fraudulent and for the purpose of evading payment."

SEC. 1210. That section twenty-six of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, as amended by the Act entitled "An Act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March third, nineteen hundred and seventeen, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 26. Every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company subject to the tax herein imposed, when required by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall render a correct return, duly verified under oath, of its payments of dividends, whether made in cash or its equivalent or in stock, including the names and addresses of stockholders and the number of shares owned by each, and the tax years and the applicable amounts in which such dividends were earned, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

SEC .1211. That Title I of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, is hereby amended by adding to Part III five new sections, as follows:

"SEC. 27. That every person, corporation, partnership, or association, doing business as a broker on any exchange or board of trade or other similar place of business shall, when required by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, render a correct return duly verified under oath, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, showing the names of customers for whom such person, corporation, partnership, or association has transacted any business, with such details as to the profits, losses, or other information which the commissioner may require, as to each of such customers, as will enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to determine whether all income tax due on profits or gains of such customers has been paid.

"SEC. 28. That all persons, corporations, partnerships, associations, and insurance companies, in whatever capacity acting, including lessees or mortgagors of real or personal property, trustees acting in any trust capacity, executors, administrators, receivers, conservators, and employers, making payment to another person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company, of interest, rent, salaries, wages, premiums, annuities, compensation, remuneration, emoluments, or other fixed or determinable gains, profits, and income (other than payments described in sections twenty-six and twenty-seven), of $800 or more in any taxable year, or, in the case of such payments made by the United States, the officers or employees of the United States having information as to such payments and required to make returns in regard thereto by the regulations hereinafter provided for, are hereby authorized and required to render a true and accurate return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under such rules and regulations and in such form and manner as may be prescribed by him, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, setting forth the amount of such gains, profits, and income, and the name and address of the recipient of such payment: Provided, That such returns shall be required, regardless of amounts, in the case of payments of interest upon bonds and mortgages or deeds of trust or other similar obligations of corporations, joint-stock companies, associations, and insurance companies, and in the case of collections of items (not payable in the United States) of interest upon the bonds of foreign countries and interest from the bonds and dividends from the stock of foreign corporations by persons, corporations, partnerships, or associations, undertaking as a matter of business or for profit the collection of foreign payments of such interest or dividends by means of coupons, checks, or bills of exchange.

"When necessary to make effective the provisions of this section the name and address of the recipient of income shall be furnished upon demand of the person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company paying the income.

"The provisions of this section shall apply to the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen and each calendar year thereafter.

"SEC. 29. That in assessing income tax the net income embraced in the return shall also be credited with the amount of any excess profits tax imposed by Act of Congress and assessed for the same calendar or fiscal year upon the taxpayer.

"SEC. 30. That nothing in section II of the Act approved October third, nineteen hundred and thirteen, entitled 'An Act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' or in this title, shall be construed as taxing the income of foreign governments received from investments in the United States in stocks, bonds, or other domestic securities.

"SEC. 31. That all contracts entered into after the enactment of this amendment by which any person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company agrees to pay any portion of the tax imposed by this title upon any other person, corporation, association, or insurance company, or to reimburse such person, corporation, association, or insurance company for any portion of such tax, shall be void, and any person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company entering into such a contract shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000."

SEC. 1212. That any amount heretofore withheld by any withholding agent as required by Title I of such Act of September eighth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, on account of the tax imposed upon the income of any individual, a citizen or resident of the United States, for the calendar year nineteen hundred and seventeen, shall be released and paid over to such individual, and the entire tax upon the income of such individual for such year shall be assessed and collected in the manner prescribed by such Act as amended by this Act.

TITLE XIII.—GENERAL PROVISIONS.

SEC. 1300. That if any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this Act shall for any reason be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder of said Act, but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

SEC. 1301. That Title I of the Act entitled, "An Act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extension of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March third, nineteen hundred and seventeen, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 1302. That unless otherwise herein specially provided, this Act shall take effect on the day following its ~~passage~~ enactment.

Mr. SMOOT subsequently, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably without amendment concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 8), and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed in document form 50,000 copies of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, and Senate Report No. 75 thereon; of which 25,000 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 20,000 for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and 2,500 for the use of the Committee on Finance of the Senate.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, before going into a discussion of the pending bill I desire to say just a word or two about its constitutionality. I have examined it with just a little care and have convinced myself that the bill is constitutional. I do not intend to go into the cases or go into the constitutional matter at any length, but I do wish to state that I think its constitutionality is hinged upon the four following provisions of the Constitution, namely, those which authorize Congress "to declare war," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a Navy," and "to provide for the common defense and general welfare, and in addition the following provision:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Mr. President, it is not necessary to go further than these provisions to ascertain the constitutionality of this measure. There are various other propositions of less degree or authorizations of less degree, but they need not be considered. These give ample constitutional authority for the bill.

Mr. President, when these provisions of our Constitution were being considered the very questions we have been discussing here were considered by the framers of that great instrument,

Among others who discussed them were Mr. Hamilton, and here is what he had to say about it:

The authorities essential to the common defense are these: To raise armies, to build and equip fleets, to prescribe rules for the government of both, to direct their operation, to provide for their support. These powers ought to exist without limitation, because it is impossible to foresee or define the extent and variety of national exigencies or the correspondent extent and variety of the means which may be necessary to satisfy them. The circumstances that endanger the safety of the nations are infinite, and for this reason no constitutional shackles can wisely be imposed on the power to which the care of it is committed. This power ought to be coextensive with all the possible combinations of such circumstances, and ought to be under the direction of the same councils which are appointed to preside over the common defense.

* * * * * * *

Whether there ought to be a Federal Government intrusted with the care of the common defense is a question in the first instance open for discussion, but the moment it is decided in the affirmative it will follow that the Government ought to be clothed with all the powers requisite to complete execution of its trust. (Federalist, No. 23.)

Mr. Madison also said:

Is the power of declaring war necessary? No man will answer this question in the negative. It would be superfluous, therefore, to enter into a proof of the affirmative. The existing confederation establishes this power in the most ample form.

* * * * * * *

It is in vain to oppose constitutional barriers to the impulse of self-preservation. (Federalist, No. 41.)

Now, Mr. President, in view of these broad general provisions commonly known as the war powers of the Constitution, in view of their interpretation by those who formed them, and that of the courts which have construed them, take them and apply them to the food question which we have here. What is the most important proposition in connection with supporting an army? It is feeding that army. What is the most important question in maintaining a navy? It is feeding and provisioning that navy. We all know that in the world war that is going on the most important question for each and every nation engaged in it and even those that are not engaged in it is the food question. Here is a direct constitutional authority for providing for the food question to support the Army and to maintain the Navy of our country. Why need we go further for authority? It strikes me that it is as ample and as full and as complete as it is possible to be. As Mr. Madison said when they were considering the Constitution, it is not only ample and complete but must be so. There must be no shackles on it, and there are no shackles upon the power of Congress, in my judgment, to provide for the common defense and to support the Army and Navy of our land, and to pass all needful measures intended to bring about that end.

Why go into finely spun, closely drawn decisions of our courts? I have read many of them, with some of which you can very readily agree and others you can not. But here are the plain provisions of the Constitution authorizing Congress to do anything for the support of the Army and the maintenance of the Navy, and as food is the principal support of the Army and Navy I think we need go no further and there need be no doubt about the constitutionality of the bill.

Mr. President, I can not agree with the views that were expressed by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] the other day when he said that during war time certain clauses and phrases of our Constitution were suspended in their operation. As I recall his argument, it was that he thought this bill was unconstitutional, but he was going to vote for it because he believed certain clauses and phrases of the Constitution were nonoperative or suspended during time of the war and that relieved him from all obligations to support those particular provisions and left him with full authority to vote for measures not strictly constitutional.

I do not agree with that thought. I believe such doctrines are harmful to the Republic. I believe that the Constitution is the same for war times that it is for peace times. It was intended alike to cover both and at all times. I would not support any measure on earth, however important it might be, however necessary it might be, if I believed it was not constitutional. I have no such doubt about this bill.

I believe it is constitutional, and therefore I am going to give it my support. As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] says on the side to me, I believe that my oath is worth something, and that I am absolutely bound by it, and I am going to vote for the bill because I believe it is a proper bill and because I believe it is a constitutional bill.

Mr. President, we are facing a great crisis in this country, probably the greatest that was ever known to it. Congress has declared war. It has voted $7,000,000,000 to carry on that war and to bring it to an early and successful conclusion. It has passed a conscription law so that all necessary soldiers may be secured to win the war. It has passed the largest appropriation bill for the use of our Army that has ever been passed in the history of any nation in the world. It has given every dollar that has been asked by the War and the Navy Departments. It has passed a law amending and strengthening the Federal Reserve System so that we might not be handicapped by lack of finance during the war. It has passed a mammoth shipping bill to secure a great merchant marine for our country in these times. It has passed the espionage law so that our country might be protected from its enemies. It has already passed a general bill looking to greater food production and food conservation, and also a law dealing with our transportation lines so that our country will be in the best possible condition to fight the war.

Mr. President, none of these various measures, as important and stupendous as they are, are as important or as far-reaching as the present bill. I realize that some kind of control is necessary, and that this measure, or one along the line of this measure, should be enacted. When the espionage bill was up, I voted for a prohibition of food speculation. We put in some kind of a provision about food speculation, some namby-pamby, meaningless legislation that permits the food gamblers of our country to get together and advise our Government as to how gambling in food shall be carried on. By the way, there is very much such a provision in the present bill. But I voted for whatever we could get then. I preferred a better food-gambling measure and finally voted for the best that we could get through. I think it ought to have been made stronger. I hope it will be made stronger in conference, and I hope we may yet make the provision in the pending bill much stronger.

I also voted in the other measure to prohibit the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of alcoholic liquors.

I believe there is such a provision in this bill. There have been so many provisions I hardly know which to call the Senate measure and which the House measure, but we all know it is a fight between liquor and prohibition, a fight between what is known as "bone-dry" prohibition and licensed liquor dealing. I voted then, as I expect to vote at this time, for the prohibition of the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of liquors.

Now, in considering food questions we can not follow the example of our European brethren. They have a different system from what we have. A great many people seem to think that what we need is the experience of France and Germany and Italy and other countries in dealing with the food question. I do not think that at all. All those countries are not self-supporting. They are all great importing countries. Our country makes all its foodstuffs and then has some to spare. Even in lean years we make always more than we can use. There is no such situation confronting our people as confronts the European nations.

There are a number of reasons for high prices, in my judgment. One of these is the war, of course. The increased demand brought about for foodstuffs, brought about by the usual and ordinary war conditions, has tended to raise prices, and to raise those prices very greatly. That is one of the reasons for the present high prices. Another one is that our country has been enjoying unexampled prosperity for a long time. Our circulating medium has greatly increased. It has more than doubled in the last few years. Very naturally that has the effect of increasing prices. I do not think it has the effect argued for it by the distinguished and learned Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I do not think it goes that far, but I think it has an effect on it. I do not recall exactly how far the Senator said it went, but it went some distance.

Mr. REED. No; the Senator is in error.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I find I am in error, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. REED. The Senator has inadvertently stated the matter rather unfairly. I said that it was one of the great causes and I cited Prof. Fisher.

Mr. McKELLAR. On that I agree with the Senator entirely, and if I have stated it too strongly, I beg the Senator's pardon. That is one of the great causes surely, as the able Senator has stated it.

That is the second one, and the third cause is the action of foreign Governments, without any efforts to deal with our Government on the subject, sending their agents for the purpose of buying foodstuffs and various other war matériel. They come in competition with our own people and naturally that has a tendency to raise the prices very greatly, and it is one of the most important causes of high prices to-day.

The fourth is our transportation facilities. They have been bad. We have been trying to improve them, and I believe we will improve them. If we had an equitable and an economical distribution of our foodstuffs throughout the country we would have very much less prices, and our railroads are largely to blame, or, at any rate, considerably to blame, for the present high prices.

Undoubtedly the shortage of the wheat crop had something to do with the former high price of wheat. I believe the price is going down very rapidly, and I have no doubt it will go down a great deal more rapidly in the future if we have a fairly good crop.

But there is another reason for high prices, and that is the calamity howls that have been going up over the country, especially in our newspapers and from some of our officials, for quite a while about the short crops.

Those six causes, as it seems to me, are the principal causes of the high prices.

Just to show how mistaken we can be, how we can be thrown off our balance about these matters, how the excitement of the situation can bring about a kind of hysteria which has the effect of making prices go upward is shown in an article that was written by Mr. Secretary Houston in March for the April number of some food journal. It is a very illuminating article. In that article he shows that there were more meats in our country then, that there were more eggs, more poultry, more fish, more butter, more barley, more oats, more corn, more of every possible foodstuff than ever was known at a similar time of the year in our history, except two articles alone, and yet the high prices apply to all the other foodstuffs just like they apply to the two articles that are scarce. He gives the facts and figures, and I am going to ask unanimous consent to put them in my remarks. He gives in terms the facts, showing that we have more foodstuffs than we have ever had before, and yet these high prices prevail. Here is what he has to say about wheat: In the year 1916 we made the largest crop of wheat that was ever known to the world, over 1,000,000,000 bushels. The wheat crop did fall off last year and only 640,000,000 bushels were raised. The average amount for five years is about 728,000,000 bushels.

In other words, we were 88,000,000 bushels short last year, taking care of ourselves and the export trade, too.

Mr. Houston shows that from the crop of the preceding year of a thousand million bushels the surplus brought over was largely more than enough to take care of the shortage last year, thereby proving that we have more wheat this year, or as much wheat this year, as we have had in former years, and that the present high price was not due to a shortage. In this article, which was prepared about three months ago, after summing up all these facts, the Secretary of Agriculture states that it was highly improbable that we should have to have food control in this country; and yet it has not been a month ago that he came out in a newspaper article and said it was absolutely necessary. The same facts exist.

I quote as follows from a magazine article from the April number of the American Food Journal by Secretary Houston:

ESTIMATED FOOD SUPPLY FOR THE CURRENT YEAR.

The weather conditions during the growing season of 1916 were unfavorable in many parts of the world. They were distinctly unfavorable in this country. Although there was a large wheat acreage, the weather conditions were such as to favor the appearance of the black-rust disease affecting wheat. The consequence was that, although the acreage was large, the yield was relatively small. The conditions were not especially favorable for corn and for some other important crops. Still the food output on the whole for the current year was not so small as to excite alarm. The corn crop was 2,600,000,000 bushels, nearly the five-year average. The oat crop was above the five-year average, the barley very nearly the five-year average, rye 10,000,000 bushels more than the five-year average, and rice 40,000,000 bushels, as against 29,000,000 bushels the year before, and 24,500,000 bushels, the five-year average. The production of Kafir corn, a relatively new crop, was 50,000,000 bushels. The production of peaches, 37,000,000 bushels, of pears 10,400,000 bushels, and of apples 67,500,000 barrels, represents approximately the five-year average, while the estimated production of oranges was 23,800,000 boxes, or 2,600,000 more than that of the preceding year. The crop of sugar beets was one of the largest ever produced. Meat products, likewise, were produced in larger quantities, the estimated amount for the year being 22,378,000,000 pounds, as against a five-year average of 19,712,000,000 pounds, or 2,000,000,000 pounds greater than the output for the year 1915. Dairy products on the whole showed a gain as follows:

	1913	1915	1914	Average, 1910–1914.
Milk produced, gallons	7,959,656,000	7,696,844,000	7,506,794,000	7,569,926,000
Milk, sold, gallons	2,061,551,000	1,993,482,000	1,944,260,000	1,960,611,000
Butter, pounds	1,059,771,000	1,024,780,000	999,476,000	1,007,882,000
Cheese, pounds	12,246,000	11,841,000	11,549,000	11,646,000
Butter fat sold, pounds	326,346,000	315,571,000	307,778,000	310,367,000
Cream sold, gallons	57,888,000	55,977,000	54,595,000	55,054,000

Poultry products also increased as indicated:

	1913	1915	1914	Average, 1910–1914.
Eggs, dozen	1,847,512,000	1,810,912,000	1,774,312,000	1,701,789,000
Fowls raised, number	566,722,000	555,494,000	544,267,000	522,021,000

WHEAT.

The two food products which reveal a marked decrease were wheat and Irish potatoes. It is evident that the public has failed to look at all the acts involved, especially in the case of wheat. The wheat crop for the current year was reported to be 640,000,000 bushels as against a five-year average of 728,000,000 bushels, and the record crop of 1915 of 1,026,000,000 bushels. Apparently, the public has compared the crop of 1916 solely with the record crop of 1915, and failed to take into account the unusually large carry over from that year into the present year of 164,000,000 bushels or more. Furthermore, its attention has been fixed on the large exports of the two years immediately following the outbreak of the war. The exports of wheat in normal times are approximately 105,000,000 bushels. The year preceding the war it was 145,000,000 bushels. In 1914–15 it was 332,000,000 bushels, dropping in 1915–16 to 243,000,000 bushels. Looking only at the crop of 640,000,000 bushels and having in mind the possibilities of export as suggested by the figure of 332,000,000 for 1914–15, the public naturally apprehended that there would be a lack of bread. Dealers and others became unduly excited. The total available supply, including both the crop and the carry over, aggregating 804,000,000 bushels—part of which, it should be said, was not suitable for milling purposes—should have been considered as well as the relatively small exports for the first six months of the current year. Up to the 1st of January the exports were only 97,000,000 bushels, and they have tended to decrease partly on account of the disturbed shipping conditions since the 1st of January. Our normal domestic needs of wheat for human food for seeding purposes and for a reserve to carry over into the next year require 640,000,000 bushels. As I have stated, the total year's supply is 804,000,000 bushels. This would give us an available exportable surplus of 164,000,000 bushels. At the rate of export since the 1st of July, with the tendency to decline recently, we should have enough wheat in the country very nearly to supply normal needs.

CROP PROSPECTS.

I am not a prophet and can not furnish any guaranty for the future. There are certain things, however, I do know. The farmers, governed as they are by ordinary motives, in response to the present level of prices, have in certain directions shown a definite purpose to increase their acreage. Winter wheat was sown in the fall. The reports reveal that the total acreage was 40,090,000. This is nearly 900,000 more than the amount planted the preceding fall. Much of the latter, however,, was winter-killed, so that the planting this fall was 5,260,000 acres more than harvested last summer. Spring wheat has not been planted. In 1915 the acreage was 19,445,000 acres. The average acreage for the five years is 18,800,000.

It would be singular if this did not increase; but, taking the average for five years and adding it to the winter-wheat acreage, we have approximately 59,000,000 acres, or practically the same as the record acreage of 1915. What the yield per acre may be will depend largely on the weather conditions. The average of the six lowest yields per acre since 1894 was 12.5 bushels. This would give us 737,000,000 bushels of wheat. The average yield for five years down to the record crop of 1915 was 14.9 bushels. This would give us 879,000,000 bushels of wheat. The average for five years, including the record crop year, was 15.5 bushels. This would give us 914,000,000 bushels. A yield equal to that of 1914 of 16.6 bushels would give us 979,000,000 bushels, while a yield equal to that of the record-crop year would give us 1,000,000,000.

THE SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

The Department of Agriculture has done all it could prudently do to call attention to the desirability of adjusting the supply of different sorts of agricultural commodities to the demand. As I have said, farmers are doing their own thinking and will not submit to anybody's dictation. In the South, in particular, the department has waged a persistent campaign for some years to bring about a better agriculture, to stimulate the local production of an ampler supply of foodstuffs. The South has heretofore been too dependent on corn and cotton. It has put too many of its eggs in one basket. Although it is largely agricultural, it has imported in the neighborhood of six or seven hundred million dollars' worth of foodstuffs from the West. It is clearly good economy for the South to supply her own foodstuffs and feedstuffs, and it is certainly a safer practice for her to do so. The department, the agricultural colleges, and many other agencies through the daily press, the agricultural journals, the bankers and business men, farmers' associations, bulletins and circulars, and the farm-demonstration machinery reaching into many parts of the South, have urged the necessity of a better-balanced agriculture and the wisdom of largely increasing foodstuffs. There has been a tendency over several years for the South to practice this agriculture, and following the low price of cotton in 1914 the acreage in foodstuffs considerably increased. It remains to be seen how far the recent high price of cotton will check this tendency. It would be unfortunate if it did so.

THE MEAT SUPPLY.

A further word should be said about the tendency of the meat supply to increase. While, following the outbreak of the war, there was a considerable increase in exports of meats, amounting in 1916 to 1,500,000,000 pounds, the domestic production in 1916 was 3,000,000,000 pounds greater than in 1914, and the tendency is still upward. Figures recently submitted show that the number of cattle on January 1, 1917, was 1,037,000 greater than on January 1, 1916, and that the milch cows had increased in the same period 660,000. A very considerable development in live stock is taking place in the South.

NO FEDERAL DICTATORSHIP NEEDED.

The department and all the agricultural agencies in the country are giving definite and careful attention to these problems. The Federal Government through several of its departments is giving continuous consideration to the immediate problems presented and to the possibility of remedial measures. The solution will certainly not involve a Federal dictatorship, and it is highly unlikely that it will involve a dictatorship in any State or community. America does not take kindly to dictators. The difficulties, in any event, would be very nearly insuperable. We have a continent to deal with, and there are difficulties of double jurisdiction. Consider, for instance, the matter of fixing a minimum price. The Federal Government could deal only with commodities passing into interstate commerce. The States might be hampered in attempting to fix prices.

As I stated at the outset, there is no occasion for hysteria. Intelligent planning and constructive action, in conjunction with the operation of normal forces, are what we need, and these only can bring about a satisfactory result.

This just shows, and I am not using this for any other purpose than to show that high prices come, at least to some extent, from the newspaper statements that have been made from time to time about shortage in this country when the facts do not show that there is any such shortage, and especially from excited interviews from some of our officials. You see, all this food at the time was in the hands of speculators. Flour mounted up to, I believe, $17.50 per barrel at the highest mark, and now it is going down every day. I hope it will continue to go down and that there will be no necessity for food control even if this bill can be enacted. I hope the necessity may not arise for it, but at the same time, knowing that these foodstuffs are in the hands of speculators, I feel that one of the most important provisions of the bill is the control of speculation.

I want to say to the Senate here this afternoon do not let us put in a namby-pamby regulation of food speculators. I have heard men argue against food gamblers and state what horrible creatures they were, and then come right along and vote for a provision that merely organizes the food gamblers and does not abolish food gamblers. What we want to do is to prohibit the food gamblers, to prohibit the mobilization of food gamblers, and these high prices, in my judgment, will be dispelled and normal conditions will rise again.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator that we ought to do away with the food gambler and, for that matter, with any other kind of a gambler.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. REED. But I want to ask the Senator how much further he would go than the provisions of section 12 of House bill 4188, which we passed, and which provides—stating it briefly—that if the President shall find that any of the dealings on the grain exchanges unduly or unreasonably raise or enhance the price of wheat or other food cereals to the injury of the people of the United States he may direct the traders to desist; and if they do not at once desist, he may suspend the operations of the exchange; and then providing for a fine and imprisonment for those who violate the act? I am not saying that goes far enough, but how much further would the Senator suggest that we go?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very glad to state my views about it. I think we are putting too much upon an already overburdened President. We know that he can not do the particular things that we place upon his shoulders here every day. The Constitution of the United States does not define our duty as being that of transferring our powers to the President of the United States. You will find no such provision in the Constitution. The Senator from Missouri, with all his learning and ability and his skill in debate, can not put his finger on any clause of the Constitution which says that Congress shall have the right to delegate to the President its powers and functions. We have a duty to perform here; and I say instead of leaving it to the discretion of the President—which means some clerk—to go and examine into whether food gamblers are doing right or doing wrong, we ought to define what is gambling, then prohibit the act, and then impose upon the administrative officers of the law the duty of prosecuting those who violate the law. That is my idea of what the Senate ought to do.

But, to be more specific, I believe that the Senate ought to adopt the Thomas amendment in substance. The Senator from Missouri will recall what that is. It goes much further than the provision we have already adopted, and it would stop food gambling. That is what we all profess we want to do. The country is asking us——

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. The country is asking us to stop food gambling, and what do we propose to do in reply to that request? We are going to give the President the right to investigate into what is reasonable gambling and what is not reasonable gambling, and the unreasonable food gamblers are to be knocked out, if there are any such, and the reasonable food gamblers are to be permitted to ply their trades just as before.

I say that we are not doing what the country demands us to do unless we deal with the question directly, unless we put the strong hand of the law against the men who are dealing in the foodstuffs of the country and sending prices skyward in order to fill their own pockets at the expense of the consuming public.

I want to say here and now—I am not a prophet, but I predict—that if we simply turn this matter over to the President for investigation the food gamblers, instead of being hurt in this country, are going to flourish as never before. What will it mean? It will mean simply that Mr. Hoover, the food commissioner, will get all of the food gamblers in the country together, will have representatives from every food-gambling house in the country, put them on one of the floors in the Munsey Building, or in some other building that we may rent for him, gather them all together, and try to explain to them what is reasonable food gambling and what is unreasonable food gambling. And I want to make a prediction about that, that Mr. Hoover and his agents will find that all the food gamblers are reasonable food gamblers, and that there are no such things as unreasonable food gamblers in this country.

Now I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I did not want to interrupt the Senator from Tennessee when he departed from that phase of his argument wherein he objected seriously to imposing new duties upon the President of the United States, but I understand that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has reported an amendment which leaves it to the discretion of the President whether wine and beer shall be manufactured in this country. At that stage of his argument I desired to ask him—and I ask him now—whether, if he were confronted with the alternative of granting the discretion to the President in the matter or Congress acting directly and decisively on the same subject, he would vote in favor of the proposition to preserve the industries of beer making and wine making or whether he would prefer to leave it discretionary with the President in case of a national emergency to determine what should be done?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I had expected to take up that question a little later, but I would as lief take it up right now, since the Senator from California has asked the question. In all my life I never believed in shirking responsibility. I am willing to accept my share of responsibility at any time. I believe that is the correct principle of private life, of public life, of political life, of any kind of life, and any kind of conduct. It is very easy to shirk responsibility and to put the burden on somebody else to decide. The Senate, however, owes it to itself, it owes it to its own dignity, its own power, to decide these questions for itself. I do not believe when we come to a question of this kind upon which Senators differ, and honestly differ, that we should seek to shift the burden and to cast it upon some one else whom we hope will fix it according to our individual view. I do not think it is fair to the President, I do not think it is fair to us, I do not think it is fair to the country, I do not think it is fair to Congress as a legislative body.

Now, let us see what the facts are about this question. We all know that a majority of the American people are in favor of a sober Nation and a "dry" Nation in the conduct of this war; we all know that a majority of the Senate, if left alone, are in favor of a "dry" country and a sober Nation during the time of this war; we all know that a majority of the other House is in favor of prohibition, and especially during the time of war; we all know that our constituencies are expecting us to stand here like men and to vote our principles or our convictions. If a man is in favor of liquor and honestly so, I honor him and I respect him. I have not one word of criticism if he thinks it is the wisest policy to allow a wide-open Nation in time of war or in time of peace, either. I can only say that I frankly differ from him. I believe—and I believe a majority of the Republic think as I do about it—that it is high time that we were getting rid of the liquor traffic and the open saloon in this country. But what are we doing? Are we paying attention to the men back home who voted for us and who believe in a sober Nation? Oh, no; we are attempting to shirk the responsibility; we are attempting to shift the burden somewhere else.

This is a matter of legislation. The President can not make this country "dry"; he has no power under the Constitution to do that. To use a slang phrase, it is not up to him, but it is up to this Congress. The other House has done its duty; it has obeyed the demands of the people; it has lived up to what it professes. As I recall, a Nation-wide prohibition joint resolution passed this body by a two-thirds majority some years ago, and it came within two or three votes of passing the other House by a two-thirds majority. We all know that men vote here according to what their constituents want. The reason they have voted in that way is because their constituents have come to the conclusion that this ought to be a "dry" Nation. What are we doing here on this provision of the bill?

Every Senator here knows that there is not a Member of this body who has not views on the subject of prohibition. What are we yielding to? Well, I do not know how others may vote, but I want to say to the Senator from California, who asked me the question a while ago as to my belief about it, that I am going to vote for a "bone-dry" prohibition measure during this war, and the driest possible kind I can find.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to ask him to what bill he has just referred?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. To what bill does the Senator allude when he says that the Senate passed a prohibition bill by a large majority?

Mr. McKELLAR. A year or two ago, while I was a Member of the other House, the Senate passed, I think, what was known as the Sheppard joint resolution. I am quite sure that it did so, but it lacked about half a dozen votes of receiving two-thirds majority in the other House, of which I was a Member at the time, and I voted for it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will pardon me, did the joint resolution which was tendered here on the floor of the Senate embody national prohibition?

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the Senator's question?

Mr. LEWIS. Do I understand the Senator to say that it is his conception that there was passed here in the Senate a joint resolution that embodied national prohibition?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my recollection of it. The joint resolution proposed an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. LEWIS. And was the joint resolution passed?

Mr. McKELLAR. It was passed, as I recall, by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. I do not now see the chief advocate of the measure, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] present, but I am sure that other Senators will recall that such a joint resolution did pass the Senate at one time, but failed in the other House.

Mr. President, I am not here to criticize anybody; I do not believe very much is gained by harsh criticism, but I want to say that the House has recently passed, in connection with a food-conservation measure, and properly belonging to that measure, what is known as a "bone-dry" liquor provision. It simply provided that the foodstuffs of our country should not be manufactured into alcoholic liquors. It did shift the burden so far as wine is concerned, but so far as whisky and beer are concerned it met the issue fairly and passed upon it. That measure came over here; and the other day, when it seemed that the Congress was going to follow the demand of the great majority of the people of this Republic to have prohibition during the war, an occurrence took place here which turned a number of prohibition Senators the other way; and now it seems very doubtful whether such a measure will get through. The only thing that I can say about it is that, in my judgment, there never was such a time, there never was such an opportunity, to get a sober Nation as there was on last Friday morning. I think it is very doubtful if the advocates of prohibition—the through-and-through advocates of prohibition—are going to be able to pass that measure now. I regret that that is so; I regret very much that anything should have occurred to prevent the consummation of the hopes of the great body of God-fearing men and women of this country. I believe it would be one of the best food-conservation measures that could possibly be devised. I believe it would have done more to mobilize and make efficient the manhood of our country than any other measure that could have been devised.

Some men have said that the prohibitionists of the Senate are obstructing this bill. As one of those who believe in prohibition, I want to say that I do not think that statement has the slightest foundation in fact. I do not know of a Senator in this body who is a "bone dry" Senator, so to speak, who is not in favor of an immediate vote on this question. I know of no dilatory tactics which have been pursued. I do not know whether I am as "dry" as some of the rest of you, but I know one thing—I am willing to vote on that question at any time. I know another thing, that I am heartily in favor of this bill; and I know still another thing, that I want it passed at the earliest possible moment. I would not put anything in its way. I do not believe that the prohibition Senators here have offered any opposition, individually or collectively, and this great tumult that we have seen in the newspapers recently about the advocates of prohibition filibustering against this bill is, to my mind, the most idle talk and without the slightest foundation in fact. I think it is a calumny upon us; it is a woeful misrepresentation of us, of what we honestly believe, and of what we honestly stand for. Yet we see in every metropolitan paper in the land the statement, even this morning, that the prohibitionists in the Senate are trying to put off a vote on this measure and are trying to filibuster against it.

We know what the facts are. There never was such a lobby in Washington as there is to-day in favor of the liquor traffic. The lobby that was turned out three or four years ago by our splendid President, amid the plaudits of the people, was a Sunday school convention in comparison with the lobby that exists here to-day trying to prevent the passage of a prohibition measure which a great majority of the American people believe in, and we all know it. There is not a Senator on either side of the Chamber who does not know that the lobby of the liquor forces is the lobby that is really doing business in Washington at this good hour, and I have no doubt many of them are listening to the sound of my voice at this moment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. REED. I do not at all dispute the latter statement of the Senator, and I deplore it; but I want to ask the Senator if there has not been a good deal of lobbying on both sides of this question for a good long time? In all fairness, is not that the case?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I have heard that. I had a difficulty with a lobbyist when I first came to the House about five years ago, and since that time I have never had many visits from lobbyists. I believe my door is marked; I do not have much to do with them, and do not know much about them; but I think there are lobbyists probably on both sides of the question. However, one crowd of lobbyists have evidently been very quiet, for I have not even heard of them lately.

However, Mr. President, that is not the way to settle this question. The lobbyists of the country ought not to settle the question as to whether or not this should be a "dry" and a sober nation. We ought to settle it. The House ought to settle it for itself, and the Senate should settle it for itself. That duty is upon us. No man can blame the paid agents of any interest for trying honorably to uphold that interest, and I do not blame them; but I think, Senators, that we ought not to permit conflicting lobbies, or the claims of lobbies, to affect our votes here. It seems to be the idea that if the lobbies can be settled with, we need not bother about the Senate; that the Senate will just yield either for liquor or against it, if we arrange with the lobbies that are here. I am opposed to any such view. I believe that as Senators we ought to vote our convictions on this question and every other question. God has given us the right to think, and the people have imposed upon us the duty to think for ourselves on this and all other questions, and we ought to decide them.

Now, Mr. President, I want to refer to some of the propositions of this bill. As I stated very frankly at the outset, I am in favor of this legislation. There are some provisions in this bill, though, which, it seems to me, ought to be amended. I call the attention of the Senate to the very first section. It is not even rhetorical; it does not even make sense. If you will listen a moment I will demonstrate that fact. It reads:

Be it enacted, etc., That, by reason of the existence of a state of war—

Then there follow a number of other clauses, and it ends in this way:

To prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, or manipulations affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war.

It is a recital without a statement; it is not a completed sentence; it is not a completed paragraph; it makes no sense whatsoever. Have you examined it carefully? That is all you need to do. A casual reading will prove that it does not even make a connected sentence. I believe that that section ought to be amended in order to accomplish those things which it is sought to accomplish by the bill. I think we ought to strike out the period at the end of the section and add this:

There is hereby created and established a food board, to be composed of five members, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The members of such food board shall be citizens of the United States and men of high moral character and business attainments, none of whom shall be connected, directly or indirectly, with any food or fuel corporation. Before assuming the duties of their offices they shall be sworn to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States and shall each receive a salary of $10,000 per year, payable in monthly installments, and one of said board shall be named by the President as chairman thereof.

I want to explain why I introduced that amendment. I do not believe in organizations such as the so-called advisory committees of the Council of National Defense. We have tried that system and there is great dissatisfaction with it. That council was organized just as it is proposed to organize the food commission. We want to organize a food commission; we want to pay the men whom we employ; and we want to employ the best kind of men. For fear that it might be urged that I had some kind of objection to Mr. Hoover, I have specifically provided in this amendment that the President shall name the chairman, so that Mr. Hoover may be named. I have not the slightest objection to Mr. Hoover. I have no doubt that he is the best man that could be secured for the place. I have no desire to change that in the least; but have we not gone far enough in legislating into the hands of the President powers that he can not by any possibility or chance perform himself? We know that it is not intended that he should perform them himself; that he is obliged to employ some one; but here we are going to have a man or a board or a great body of people, who have no obligation to their Government, administering the most important law that has ever been enacted in this country; men who are not required to subscribe to an oath, who are not required to be citizens, who are not required to have any responsibilities; the Sultan of Sulu might be a member of the board under the proposed section. We ought to deal with this question as intelligent men.

Do Senators ever think about the fact that we have a Constitution to which we ought to pay some attention? The Constitution of the United States says that all officers of the Government, except some minor ones, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Ought we to disregard that plain provision of the Constitution? What is the matter with the old form of government? Why should we enter upon new and untried fields? What has been our experience? Why, Senators, if we are going to turn over the administration of this most important law to unnamed and irresponsible men, perhaps men who may be the agents of other Governments—we do not know, and that might be possible under this law, for there is nothing to prohibit it—without any responsibility to our Government, are we not doing a very unwise thing? How could anything be very much more unwise than simply to legislate to turn over to irresponsible agents the execution of such an important law as this?

Now, let us see what is the result of it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I suggest that there be better order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please preserve order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smith, Md.
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Overman	Smoot
Culberson	Kendrick	Owen	Sterling
Cummins	Kenyon	Page	Sutherland
Curtis	King	Phelan	Swanson
Dillingham	Kirby	Pittman	Tillman
Fernald	Knox	Pomerene	Townsend
France	La Follette	Ransdell	Underwood
Gronna	Lewis	Reed	Vardaman
Hale	McKellar	Robinson	Wadsworth
Harding	McLean	Shafroth	Warren
Hollis	McNary	Sheppard	Williams
Husting	Martin	Shields	Wolcott
Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Smith, Ga.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] on important business and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I can not emphasize too strongly the necessity, in my judgment, of making an amendment of the kind I have named to the first section of the bill. It is the constitutional method of dealing with the situation. It is absolutely required by our experience. It is absolutely required by what seems to me to be the necessary efficiency of the situation and the necessity of the situation. The idea of creating a great department of the Government like the food department when you do not know who is going to be in charge of it, who are going to be the agents of the Government with respect to it! Why, what need be expected if we pursue this policy? No doubt the food commissioner, whoever he may be, will get together the food barons of the country; he will get the packers, he will get the food gamblers. His offices will be as full of these people as it is possible to fill them, all of them willing to serve the Government without compensation. This bill provides that they may serve the Government without compensation; and what does that mean? Why, it is the open door to graft. We all know that.

Take the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, which I used as an illustration a while ago. It has no responsibility. Its committees are composed in a large measure of those who are dealing with the Government every day. Why, one prominent member of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense told me openly, in the presence of a number of gentlemen, that if we enacted a provision in this bill which prohibits the members of the advisory boards and committees from buying and dealing with themselves it would put the Council of National Defense out of business. I am using his words. Senators, if any one of us, either Senators or Representatives, has anything to do with a Government contract we are liable to be prosecuted and fined and imprisoned in the penitentiary and dismissed from office; and yet we go right along and establish a body like the advisory boards and committees of the Council of National Defense and give them the right to deal with themselves, to buy from themselves for the Government, and say that because it is voluntary they are relieved from the operation of the same rule that governs us.

Over 2,000 years ago the Man who spake as never man spake said:

No man can serve two masters.

And it is just as true to-day as it was then. No man can become a member of an advisory commission, with power to recommend the purchase of supplies from a company that he is serving, and not serve the company that pays him his salary at the same time he is serving his Government, to which his services are voluntarily given. There is not a Senator in this body who does not know that what I say is the truth, and there is not a Senator in this body who does not know that under the meager law that was never intended to have the effect that has been given it there are members of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense that are dealing with themselves. Many proofs have been offered of it, and we ought to stop it, and stop it right now, in this very bill. The best way to stop it is to add such an amendment as I have suggested in the first section. I appeal to the acting chairman of the committee who has this bill in charge and is familiar with legislation, and a man whom I know to be an honest and a straight and a correct man, let us have an amendment to the first section that creates a body that has only one master to serve, and that master the United States Government.

This is a critical time in our history. We are trying to raise every resource of which we are capable. We ought to be frugal. We ought not to be wasteful of the country's money. We ought not to let these men deal among themselves. We ought to see to it that there is an honest administration of the Government's money during this war. We owe it to our constituents and we owe it to the country to provide a system out of the execution of which there will arise no scandal; and that is what I plead for with Senators here this afternoon. Let us have a responsible body to enforce and carry out the terms and provisions of this most important bill. It is the most far-reaching bill that was ever passed by any legislative body in any nation of the world. Let us make it truly an effective measure by having a responsible executive department, responsible alone to the United States Government, having no other interests to serve except that Government, receiving a salary from that Government, and receiving a salary from no other corporation or firm or individual that has a hold up its services. Any other measure is dishonest, or at least opens the door to dishonesty.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree entirely with the Senator from Tennessee that we ought to see to it that provisions are incorporated in the bill that will prevent the things he has described; but I want to ask him if he does not think section 3 of this bill will do the very thing he has suggested?

Mr. McKELLAR. I say to the Senator that I do; but I understand that there is a movement on foot to prevent the passage of section 3. I understand that it is not what is wanted. I am pleading for the enactment of section 3.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Who is objecting to it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not care to call names here; but a member of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense told me, in company with others, that if put into effect, section 3 would put the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense out of business, because they were dealing with themselves.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me further, I think I ought to state, in justice to the men who are very anxious to have this bill passed, especially Mr. Hoover, that, so far as I know, Mr. Hoover is not opposed to this provision.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand not; and I want to say, in all justice to Mr. Hoover, that I know nothing in the world about him except what is absolutely right, and under the amendment that I have offered to section 1 the President will have ample authority to appoint Mr. Hoover as chairman of this board. I think, under the circumstances, he ought to be appointed; and my remarks along this line are not aimed at any individual, but they are aimed at a system and a policy of government that I think is wrong, and which gives an open door to fraud and rascality that we will all be ashamed of in the future unless it is cut out now.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator permit me to express the hope that Congress, the Senate and the House, will enact such laws as the judgment of the Senate and the House shall dictate, rather than yield to outside influences? It is not a question of whether it is going to please Mr. Hoover or any other very excellent gentleman. Congress is charged with the duty of legislating, and I trust that it may perform that function in a proper and dignified manner.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator, of course. We all do on that question.

Now I want to call the attention of the committee, and especially of the acting chairman, to the second section of this bill. Let me read:

That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized to enter into any voluntary arrangements or agreements, to create—

And the words "create and" are interlined by the committee—to create and use any agency or agencies, to accept, in his discretion, the services of any person without compensation, to cooperate with any agency or person, to utilize any department or agency of the Government, and to coordinate their activities so as to avoid any preventable loss or duplication of effort or funds.

So far as coordinating with the other departments of the Government is concerned, they already have the power to do that. There is not any necessity of saying a word about that, but, so far as that part of the section is concerned, it is of no importance. The President will have that power, anyway. But what is the meat in that section? It is the authority to accept the voluntary services of other persons. Why, there will be more food speculators in Washington, there will be more food barons in Washington, more meat packers, more heads of egg trusts, more members of boards of trade dealing in futures in wheat and oats and barley; there will be more millers hanging around Washington getting on these voluntary committees that will be organized than there are down in the Munsey Building to-day—and, to use more slang, that will be going some—if you enact this legislation.

Now, Senators, I want to say this: For my part, I believe that the laborer is worthy of his hire. If we are going to demand the services of anybody, if we are going to accept the services of anybody, we ought to pay what those services are reasonably worth.

Why should we do otherwise? What reason is there for it? There is but one reason upon earth. Some men are going to be patriotic and will be willing to give their services, but they ought not to be required to do it. We have no right to take them without compensation except when we put them in the Army, and even there we give them their pay. The Government is amply able to pay. Why not have agents and representatives that have responsibility solely and alone to the Government if we want to get the best results from this law? Why should we want to accept voluntary services? There can be but one reason—that designing men will desire to get on the inside in the management and control of the food board—the most important legislation that ever was enacted, the most important board that ever was created in this country.

Mr. BRADY rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. They will want to get on the inside, just as they have wanted to get on the inside and get the cream of the contracts in the Council of National Defense, and they will make this splendid bill a laughingstock and a shame to us who made it unless we are careful. Let us have paid agents, and give them salaries worthy of their ability, and have them responsible alone to the Government that pays them.

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that I am very heartily in accord with the statements he has made; and he has certainly presented very forceful reasons why no man should be employed by the Government or permitted to render services for the Government in the capacity of advisor who is interested in any article that is sold to the Government. But the committee gave the section he has just read a great deal of thought; and if there is any reason in the world why that section would permit fraud or deception, or permit any man to work for the Government who is selling property to the Government or dealing with the Government—that would enable him to sell, you might say, to himself—I am just as much opposed to it as the Senator from Tennessee can possibly be.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for his views. I thought he was that kind of a Senator and that kind of a man. I will tell you what it is: It is almost in the language of the bill which we passed creating the Council of National Defense. In that bill there is one of those provisions that the council may accept the voluntary services of others, just as there is in this bill, and what have they built up on it? They have built up one of the most powerful institutions in this city or in this Government, purely upon the simple words that the Council of National Defense is permitted to accept the voluntary services of such men as may want to give them and in their opinion can render good service.

Mr. President, we ought not to make a mistake about this. There is not a man in the Senate who does not want to do exactly the right thing, who does not want to do the best thing for his Government during this time of its peril. This, of all times, should make us scrutinize these measures. As the Senator knows, I am heartily in favor of the purpose of this bill, but I want, if I may, to improve it wherever we can, to make it stronger and better, to make it more efficient, to insure a more honest and a more careful administration of the work under it.

Mr. BRADY. In other words, the Senator desires to have it safeguarded in every way possible.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to have it safeguarded in every way possible, and where we know, as we know in this case, that the use of these words allowing the acceptance of voluntary services has built up a machine down here in the Munsey Building where the rankest kind of favoritism is being shown, where men are dealing with themselves and do not deny it, and at the same time acting for the Government, we ought by all means to strike out these seemingly harmless words which are fraught with so much danger to our Government.

Mr. BRADY. If the Senator will permit another observation, I want to say that the committee gave that matter very careful consideration, some of us, at least, realizing that the condition the Senator so ably illustrates exists, and that is the reason why section 3 was added. Now, section 2 was really put in there for the reason that Mr. Hoover himself is giving his services voluntarily, and is not accepting any salary whatever from the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is very magnanimous conduct on the part of Mr. Hoover; that is very patriotic in Mr. Hoover. I respect him and I honor him for it, but, at the same time, the Government of the United States is no pauper. We ought not to accept the services of Mr. Hoover or any other man without paying him, especially if he is a man gifted and trained as Mr. Hoover is. We ought to pay him what those services are reasonably worth.

Mr. BRADY. But does not the Senator believe that a man might be very patriotic in doing a thing of that kind and render honest service if he intends to abide by the law, if we insert section 3? I want to say to the Senator here and now that if we do not insert section 3 I am absolutely in favor of the very line of procedure that he suggests; but I hope that by inserting section 3 we will protect ourselves so that we can have the services of such splendid men as Mr. Hoover, and that is my only reason for supporting that measure in that way.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see what is running through the Senator's mind and I agree with him that section 3 as it is will prevent or rectify the mistakes of section 2—that is, if any mistake has been made.

In talking in this way about members of the advisory committees, I want to say that I believe that there are some just as honest and patriotic men, generously working for their Government, among those advisory committees, as there are to be found in this country, but, on the other hand, we who have to deal with the situation know that there are others among them who are not so patriotic and not so fair and just, and they ought to be curbed.

Mr. BRADY. And who are at this time in the employ of the Government without pay, and are dealing with themselves. That very thing should be stopped, and it is the purpose and intent of this bill to stop it, and it can only be stopped by adopting section 3. I feel that if that is adopted section 2 will then serve a very useful purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. But if section 3 is not adopted, section 2 certainly ought to be amended along the very lines that the Senator from Tennessee so ably suggests.

Mr McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I agree with him along that line; but, to be absolutely on the safe side, when the vote on section 2 comes I am going to vote against it, and then, when we vote on section 3, I am going to join the Senator in voting in favor of section 3.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator believe that when the American people, the folks back home, understand section 3 and what it is aimed at and what has been going on here in Washington, there is any influence, of the advisory commission or of anybody else, that can stop the passage of section 3?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator in all frankness that, knowing what every Senator here knows, and with my knowledge of the absolute honesty and sincerity of every Senator here, section 3 is going to remain in this bill regardless of any objection from that or any other source, and it ought to be there; and I want to thank the committee for putting it in there. I believe that if did the very best and highest and noblest of work when it put it in there. I do not know who is the author of section 3, but he deserves the highest praise of the American people, and in that way he simply puts all agents of the Government on the same basis as Representatives and Senators and other agents of the Government.

So much for that, Mr. President. I now come to section 4. In the bill, as passed by the House, it will be found that section 4 and section 6 and section 8 and section 9 all refer to exactly the same matter, and the draftsman of the bill simply was very careless in the drafting of the bill. The committee has very wisely stricken out sections 8 and 9 and a part of section 6 and put a penalty in section 4 which makes it all right.

I next come to section 5.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I think it is fair to say to the Senator from Tennessee that section 3 was reported out by a unanimous vote of the committee. There was no dissension among the members of the committee over section 3.

Mr. McKELLAR. My admiration and esteem for the committee, as high as it was before, has been very greatly heightened by the knowledge of that fact.

Now, as to section 5, I wish to say in all frankness I am opposed to that section. I think it is unwise. That section provides for licensing all wholesale dealers in this country, with a few exceptions. I do not believe we have gotten to a point where men ought to take out a Federal license to do business. I do not believe we have reached a point where any such program is necessary. I think it will be hurtful to the business interests of our country. I think it will hamper them. I think it will prevent the very thing that it was intended to accomplish. I believe that it should be stricken out entirely. It is wholly unnecessary in the bill, and I hope when an amendment will be offered—and I expect to offer it myself if no one else does—the Senate will agree to strike that provision from the bill. It has many inequalities in it that ought to be stricken out anyway, but the whole section ought to go out.

Think of how much power it puts in the hands of an agent of the Government. Did any Senator ever have much knowledge—of course, none of them had anything to do with it—of how the liquor business was carried on when the mayors of the cities used to license it in the old days? Some liquor dealers violated the law; they did as they pleased, disregarded the wishes of the community, but they stood in with the powers that were and they did business without let or hindrance to the great damage of the community. Others who were not so fortunate felt the strong arm of the law whenever they violated it.

Now, I do not think that power ought to be placed in the hands of this agent of the Federal Government unless it is absolutely necessary. I do not think there is anything in the present situation or in the prospective situation which makes that necessary. I do not believe we ought to go into that at this time, and I hope an amendment striking out section 5 will be agreed to by the Senate, and that it will not become a part of this law. This is an excellent law, taken as a whole. It is a most valuable law, it is a reasonable law; it has great power; but there are checks and balances on it, and checks and balances that a thinking man must approve. Now, when you put in this provision a power to examine into the business of others you depart from the conservative purposes of the bill and you get on very dangerous ground. I sincerely hope that section 5 will not be adopted.

So far as section 6 and section 7 are concerned, they are just parts of section 4. They are sort of corollaries; but section 4, dealing with the entire subject matter of the bill, I think ought to be there, and it is very proper.

I turn over next to section 8, and there again the committee has acted as it seems to me very wisely. You have limited the requisition of food to the uses of the Army and Navy and the other departments of the Government. I think that will have a very wholesome effect, a very wise effect. I think it will have something to do very largely with the prices of foodstuffs and fuels in this country. I believe that it is an authority that ought to be granted this board or the President, whichever is clothed with the authority. It is a wise provision and it goes just far enough. Under the old bill it went too far. It authorized them to requisition anything for any purpose, but this amendment, as I understand it, limits it, and it is a very proper limitation, and my own purpose is to vote for it as it is amended, and I hope it will be enacted into law.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not have the bill before me, but there is a provision in section 8 known as subdivision (b).

Mr. McKELLAR. I have it. I am looking at it right now. I was just going to refer to it.

Mr. NORRIS. It has no relationship whatever to the balance of the section and has nothing to do with the purchase or commandeering of goods for the Army or Navy. I ask if that is not the provision which provides for the President buying in the market of anybody and selling to anybody he pleases?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so, unquestionably.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that ought to be an independent and separate section. It has not anything to do with the substance or the subject matter of the section. It has to do with the Army and Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that it seems to me the court would limit the section to purchases by the President for the purposes set out in section 8. In other words, it merely gives him the right to purchase instead of to commandeer. I am inclined to agree with the Senator, but that power in the hands of the President in the section would not be objectionable to me.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator has put his hand on the one reason, outside of a matter of form, why we ought not to couple these things together; but if there is any danger that subdivision (b) would be construed by a court as the Senator has intimated and have application only to things for the Army and the Navy, then certainly we ought to make it separate. I think it was the theory and idea of the committee, it was added there, that it should not be confined to material for the Army and Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have practiced law for quite a while, and of course to some extent I am fairly familiar with the constructions of statutes by courts, and it is my judgment that that would be construed in connection with the section and not in connection with the entire bill. I believe it would be confined to the purposes and objects of the section.

Mr. NORRIS. That is an additional reason, I think, why it ought to be a separate section.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was just coming to that when the Senator called my attention to it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I can see no objection to making it a separate section, but I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to subdivision (b). It refers to the question of a minimum price. Subdivision (a) has nothing whatever to do with the minimum price. The President there can take for the Army and Navy food, feed, and fuel at such compensation as may be fixed by him, with the right to go into the court, while under subsection (b) he can do nothing of that kind at all; he can not pay less than a minimum price. So it refers to the section by necessity where a minimum price is guaranteed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is very involved where it is.

Mr. KENYON. It is involved and it ought to be simplified.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is a member of the committee, and I am sorry the Senator in charge of the bill is not here. I think that obscurity in the section ought to be cleared up by amendment. I have not prepared an amendment on that line myself, but I hope the Senators who are on the committee will do so and have it arranged properly. I think it is quite involved and obscure.

Mr. BRADY. I think that is very important, for the reason that several attorneys in addition to the Senator now occupying the floor have expressed to-day in the Senate the same doubt as to whether it does apply or whether it does not. If there is any doubt about it, it is very easy for us to settle it beyond all doubt by rewriting the same language and inserting whatever we may decide to put in.

Mr. McKELLAR. In a separate section?

Mr. BRADY. In a separate section. Then there would be no question about it at all. If there is anything we should do in this bill, it is to make it plain and understandable by not only judges and attorneys but by the laymen of the land.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so. As I said, the friends of the measure at this time ought to use every effort to strengthen the bill and to make it fair and just. It has a great many powers attached to it, and we can not be too careful as to the wording of the bill as well as its purposes, and as to its effect.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment necessarily would be a very simple one. It is more a matter of punctuation than anything else. All we would have to do would be to put in section 8½ or section 8a or section 9 and then renumber the subsequent sections, and commence it with a capital letter; that is all.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that might well be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that subdivision (b) provides that the purchases must be at not less than the minimum price, and they are to sell the goods that are to be sold at a reasonable price. That necessarily could not have been for our Army, but I agree with the Senator, as I said before, that it is a poor place to insert it, and that it would be certainly unsuitable in form to change it into a separate section.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator I did not happen to be in the Chamber at the time he was arguing this question or I would not have undertaken to argue it after him. However, I agree with him entirely. I think that unquestionably it ought to be a separate paragraph or section, dealing with the matter separately, so that there can not be any misunderstanding about it. Unquestionably the semicolon and the parentheses and the letter (b) would indicate that it only had connection with the section. Those ought to be stricken out entirely and a new section put in.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to ask the Senator, as I did not understand clearly his position, whether or not he favors subdivision (b) as an independent proposition which authorizes the President, in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and the consumer, to purchase any of these so-called necessaries?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator desires my opinion, I have already stated it. I think that is a very wise provision of the law. I think the power ought to be somewhere in a bill like this. I doubt if it will ever have to be used. The very fact that it is there and capable of being used at any moment will have the desired effect, just as I stated to the Senator from Utah yesterday when he was talking about copper, I believe, or aluminum, and using the coal barons meeting here the other day as an illustration.

He said the Council of National Defense got together with the coal dealers throughout the country and they had agreed on a reasonable price and it had been settled satisfactorily to everybody. Suppose the head of that committee of the council had had this power to commandeer coal or to buy coal at a price fixed by the Government under the provisions of this bill, do you not think there would have been a very different price arranged for coal between those people? I do; and it no doubt would have been a price that would have satisfied the country, whereas we have already seen that the price which was agreed upon by the chairman of that committee and by the coal dealers of the country has proved to be wholly unsatisfactory, even to the Government. The Government is divided as to whether it was a good settlement or a bad settlement. So I think I may state to the Senator from South Dakota that this power ought to be lodged in the hands of the Executive, who can use it reasonably and fairly for the benefit of the whole people.

Mr. STERLING. Does not the Senator then think it ought to be connected in terms with the prosecution of the war or with the national security and defense?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator had heard the opening part of my argument on the question——

Mr. STERLING. I am sorry I did not hear it.

Mr. McKELLAR. On the constitutionality of this law I think he would have been convinced that this provision is constitutional, even without any statement. In other words, I will say to the Senator in my judgment you do not have to set out a specific provision of the Constitution in connection with a statute to make the statute come under the Constitution. If it does come under it, in effect, it is there whether any reason is stated or not.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator think, then, that the provision would be constitutional in time of peace?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not. I think it is constitutional under the war powers of the Government, which are these, to declare war, to build and maintain a navy, to support an army, and all provisions provided by the Constitution to carry out those provisions. As I have stated before, I think the most important function of the Government in time of war is supporting and maintaining an army and navy. Surely, if it can support and maintain the Army and Navy better by having a power such as is stated in subsection (b) it ought to have it, and it is directly within the Constitution.

Mr. STERLING. But subsection (b) does not relate to the Army and Navy. Subsection (a) relates to the Army and Navy, and distinctly relates to them.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is why I say it ought to be an independent section, and it then would relate to all the purposes of the bill as set out in the title. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. BRADY. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. BRADY. As a matter of fact, the bill is now being considered and it will be enacted as a war measure, and it so states in the opening sentence of the first section.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. BRADY. For that reason any part of it we may enact or any section we may insert in the bill will be considered as a war measure and not as a peace measure. There are many things in the bill that neither the Senator nor myself would vote for in time of peace, but we are voting for whatever we do vote for in the bill as a war measure.

Mr. McKELLAR. Declarations in a bill do not affect their constitutionality. You could put as many provisions of the Constitution in a bill as you could name and unless the subject matter was there constitutionally the bill would be unconstitutional; declarations would count for nothing.

Now, Mr. President, I come to section 9.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator takes up that matter, I desire to call his mind back to his discussion of the question of the necessity of an amendment to prevent men serving the Government and at the same time taking private contracts.

Mr. McKELLAR. To prevent them from serving God and mammon.

Mr. REED. I think there was some challenge made of the Senator's statement that there was a necessity for that kind of an amendment. I desire to call his attention to an article in the Evening Star of to-day under a Chicago headline. It appears to be an Associated Press dispatch:

> Julius Rosenwald, chairman of the committee on supplies of the Council of National Defense, has issued a statement in which he charges that legislation pending in Congress putting members of the council upon the same footing as Congressmen in the matter of accepting contracts for the Government would practically put the council out of business. He said:
> "Congressmen, under the Constitution, can not be interested in any contracts with the Government, and Congress now, it appears, has tacked a rider to the food bill, the effect of which, if passed and not vetoed by the President, would be to legislate the committees of the defense council out of business by putting the members in the same class with Representatives and Senators.
>
> "This is stupid, shortsighted, nonsensical, and foolish."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What newspaper is that?

Mr. REED. I am reading from the alleged statement of Mr. Julius Rosenwald, chairman of the committee on supplies of the Council of National Defense. This is his frank opinion of the Agricultural Committee which reported this amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Is that limited to the Agricultural Committee?

Mr. REED. They are the only ones who have committed themselves thus far.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senate has adopted it.

Mr. REED. The Agricultural Committee reported an amendment providing that men should not be engaged in these contracts with themselves. That is the substance of the amendment. I want to give the Agricultural Committee an opportunity to look into this mirror which is held up before them by Mr. Rosenwald.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Did not the Senate adopt such a provision?

Mr. REED. I think it has been passed over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sure the Senate adopted the amendment.

Mr. REED. Thus far the words must be held to be limited to the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. KENYON. This mirror is a Sears-Roebuck mirror, I presume?

Mr. REED. Yes; it is a Sears-Roebuck mirror, and I have not any doubt that its proprietor will know how to put it into all parts of the country very rapidly and to catalogue it. I think it is very illuminating to get a real business man's opinion of the Agricultural Committee. Let me read on:

This is stupid, shortsighted, nonsensical, and foolish.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is the Agricultural Committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is his opinion of section 3.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of both the Agricultural Committee and of section 3.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a combination of the two by an able member of the advisory board.

Mr. REED. I think otherwise; as somebody suggested, the section is probably all right in the opinion of this business man. He might have added, however, that it was unbusinesslike. I read on:

This is stupid, shortsighted, nonsensical, and foolish.

Mr. KENYON. Why does the Senator keep repeating those words? [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. In order that the Senate may have the benefit of the context.

Mr. GORE. I submit that the Senator from Iowa rises to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. KENYON. I did not observe that the chairman of the committee was present.

Mr. REED. This statement continues:

It means a return to the old slipshod days of unloading on the Government—the days of rotten contracts in a time of great national emergency.

Rosenwald said if it had not been for the council "the Government would not have been able in this short time to provide supplies for a million soldiers without the slightest suspicion of graft."

Following the statement just made is this article:

The provision in the food-control bill prohibiting, under penalties of $10,000 fines and five years' imprisonment, sale to the Government of supplies by Government agents, employees, officers, or those acting in an advisory capacity in which they have a personal interest was added by unanimous indorsement of the Senate Agriculture Committee in response to widespread demand and frequent debate in Congress.

At the suggestion of Herbert C. Hoover last Sunday the committee agreed to a modification which would not prohibit employment of persons in an advisory capacity in selling to the Government products other than those in which they have a personal interest. With the modification, however, the clause still would prohibit persons acting in an advisory way from selling their supplies to the Government.

Mr. President, I trust that we shall come near enough returning to the old-fashioned, "slipshod" methods to provide that no man can represent the Government of the United States in deals with himself, and I hope that this business man, upon mature reflection, will revise his opinion regarding the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am much obliged to the Senator from Missouri for the introduction of the article which he has read. I think it merely emphasizes the absolute necessity of our dealing sternly with this proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator still intend to vote for section 3?

Mr. McKELLAR. I not only intend to vote for section 3, but I intend to work for it harder. Really I do not see how any Senator can vote against it after the statement which has just been read. I do not see how a Senator could get his conscience to permit him to vote against section 3.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator feel that this dissertation from the Sears-Roebuck Co. will have a very important effect or will influence many votes against this bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not say as to that. I do not understand just exactly what the Senator means, but if I do——

Mr. KENYON. I was making the suggestion rather ironically.

Mr. McKELLAR. I imagined that the Senator was, though at first I thought he was speaking seriously. So I will change my reply. I think this opinion from Mr. Rosenwald will emphasize the absolute necessity of two things in this bill which I have been arguing for here this afternoon. One is that we must have a responsible commission of paid agents of the Government to transact the Government's food business, wholly disassociated from the men who deal with the Government; and the other is to have a penalty and to put any man in jail who violates the provisions of section 3. I want to say right here now——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator surely would be willing to make an exception in favor of this gentleman, whose name I can not pronounce, if we will buy from the firm with which he is associated.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not willing to make any exception; but, of course, the Senator from Georgia speaks in jest when he talks in that way. I do, however, want to say that it emphasizes another thing. You will notice here that some amendment—some little harmless-looking amendment—has been offered; I do not know whether it has been offered in committee or not, but I refer to the amendment which was suggested as a modification of section 3. Has that amendment been offered in committee, I will ask the acting chairman?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment has been offered in the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been offered in the Senate by a member of the committee, I suppose. I hope there will not be any modification of this section, and certainly no modification which will make it less stringent. What we ought to do is to make section 3 more stringent. We can not go too far in that direction. It is a very harmful thing, as it seems to me, for opinions like that just read by the distinguished Senator from Missouri to be given out by the agents of the Government. I will correct that, however, because this gentleman, as I understand, is not an agent of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; he is an agent of his firm.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know about that; but certainly he is not paid by the Government; he owes no duty to the Government under the remarkable measure that we passed some time ago; a measure which ought never to have been passed, and which now ought to be repealed. We have built up a system which we ought to be ashamed of. It is a travesty upon law and justice to establish a number of men as a separate department of the Government to trade and traffic among themselves without let or hindrance, and owing no obligation to the Government, which they are supposed patriotically to serve for nothing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I want to say for the average business men in my section of the country—and I do not claim they are better than the average business men in other States—that there are very, very few of them who would for a moment think of accepting a position of trust for the Government, either of their city or their State or of their Nation, and then proceed, while occupying that trust capacity, to deal with themselves. I deny that the moral horizon of Mr. Rosenwald is that which bounds the conscience of the average business man of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is entirely right; and I want to resent such an aspersion so far as the business men of the State that I have the honor in part to represent on this floor is concerned. I do not believe Mr. Rosenwald's statement represents the business views of the real business men of the country, but only of those who are desirous of getting on the inside, where contracts are being let, in order to get something for nothing out of the Government in this time of her peril.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask if Mr. Rosenwald, to whom the Senator from Missouri refers, and to whom, I assume, the Senator from Tennessee is likewise alluding, is the member of the Advisory Council appointed from the State of Illinois?

Mr. McKELLAR. I so understand, although I can not say with positiveness.

Mr. LEWIS. I just came into the Chamber from the hall, and I should like to inquire what is the infraction that has been noted as to this particular member?

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the Senator a member of the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate?

Mr. LEWIS. I am not. I have some outward appearance of being familiar with horticulture, but not with agriculture. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator had been a member of the Committee on Agriculture I would have been too timid to read what Mr. Rosenwald is purported to have said about that committee; but, he having disclaimed being a member of that committee, I will now read what Mr. Rosenwald says about section 3, if the Senator will look at section 3 of the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I know the bill, and I will be very glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Rosenwald says, the item being under a Chicago headline, dated July 3, which is to-day:

Julius Rosenwald, chairman of the committee on supplies of the Council of National Defense, has issued a statement in which he charges that legislation pending in Congress putting members of the council upon the same footing as Congressmen in the matter of accepting contracts for the Government would practically put the council out of business. He said—

Then Mr. Rosenwald is quoted as follows:

Congressmen, under the Constitution, can not be interested in any contracts with the Government, and Congress now, it appears, has tacked a rider to the food bill, the effect of which, if passed and not vetoed by the President, would be to legislate the committees of the Defense Council out of business by putting the members in the same class with Representatives and Senators.

That would be an awful thing to do, of course. I might add I do not blame him for not wanting to be put on the same plane with Representatives and Senators. Very few people would like that. Then he goes on to state:

This is stupid, shortsighted, nonsensical, and foolish—

That is why I asked the Senator if he was a member of the committee. I did not think he would refer to his own Senator that way.—

It means a return to the old slipshod days of unloading on the Government—the days of rotten contracts in a time of great national emergency.

That is the end of the direct quotation.

Mr. LEWIS. Those are the allusions——

Mr. McKELLAR. That is why his name was brought in here.

Mr. LEWIS. Those are the expressions to which the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Tennessee have alluded?

Mr. McKELLAR. They are.

Mr. LEWIS. Assuming the quotation to be accurate, I regret that such has come from him. I have great respect for Mr. Rosenwald, and would like to see him maintain himself in such a manner that he may obtain the respect of this body, and I regret that he has found it agreeable to give out such utterance, to which I can only add the exclamation, "Important, if true!"

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I might add, if I may be pardoned——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I was going to add that I regret that a gentleman, a member of the Council of National Defense, should feel that it is his position at any distance to pass judgment upon the legislative body in such terms as the quotation seems to express in behalf of Mr. Rosenwald. I can not but incline to the idea that the quotation is much stronger than he would have ventured to have uttered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope so.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator from Tennessee——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I ask if the Senator does not know of his own knowledge that the members of the Council of National Defense, or at least one member of it, has stated that if the amendment we are discussing were to be adopted the council would be put out of business?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I suppose it would now be perfectly proper for me to say that, on official business, together with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], Representative FISHER, and possibly some others—I have forgotten just who they were—I visited the Munsey Building a few days ago, and was for the first time introduced to the members of that particular advisory board or committee. Mr. Rosenwald then stated that section 3 was a very foolish provision and would put the Council of National Defense entirely out of business, to use his words. I think I am right in that. I will ask my colleague if I am not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment. He said that to me; and I took very violent issue with him, as can be imagined from the sentiments which I have expressed here this afternoon. I feel not the slightest unkindness toward Mr. Rosenwald. I never saw him before; I have always heard him spoken of very highly since I have known of him at all; and I have no criticism to make of him now except to say that I do not believe in that kind of business, and I do not believe that the Government of the United States will permit that kind of business; and no man who has that kind of views of business and commercial life should be intrusted with any office by the American Government or the American people.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to ask the Senator if this man said to him that it was a very foolish business in which the Senator and his colleagues were engaged?

Mr. McKELLAR. He did not state that. He said that it was a very foolish business; that it would put the Council of National Defense out of business; and, as I recall, I replied that if it would put the Council of National Defense out of business to prohibit them dealing among themselves the sooner they were put out of business the better it would be for the American people.

Mr. FLETCHER. I presume the Senator means the advisory commission?

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean the advisory commission; I am not speaking of the Council of National Defense, which is composed of members of the Cabinet, who we all know are men of the highest integrity and honor and who are men whose allegiance is to the Government and who are fighting for its interests. Of course any statement made is made in reference to the advisory commission or committees and not in reference to the Council of National Defense, strictly speaking. I believe in the honesty and integrity of the members of the Cabinet on this board to the limit.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am not inclined to criticize harshly this man. On the contrary, he challenges my sense of charity. His stupid utterances are but the emanations from a mind uninformed and a spirit inflated with the vanity of riches. They are but the manifestation of that contemptuous regard which the purse-proud individual usually entertains for an honest man in public life who dares to do his duty to his country. His conduct is the impudence of ignorance, the arrogance of great wealth—the bad manners of a plutocratic vulgarian. I think it calls for action on the part of the Senate. Senators can not preserve their self-respect and have anything to do with such an ill-mannered, coarsely bred creature, and I shall be glad to vote for a resolution requesting that he withdraw altogether from the Government service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator permit me to ask him—and this is not said in a more or less facetious spirit? Does the Senator object to this matter because the gentleman said he did not want to be put on the same plane with Senators and Congressmen?

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; not at all. I hope the man may never be on the plane that I occupy. I should be dissatisfied with the plane if he should get on it.

Mr. GORE and Mr. SHIELDS rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma first.

Mr. GORE. I just wanted to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he really thinks the Senate ought to act in the spirit which he indicates?

Mr. VARDAMAN. To whom does the Senator refer?

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Why, I have no special spirit in this matter. I am not at all excited or annoyed about it. I think that when a creature of that character undertakes to put on airs and criticizes the Senate in the manner he has it is very well to call attention to it and express your opinion of such a creature.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. My colleague has referred to a conversation which he had with Mr. Rosenwald. I was present, and my colleague has stated almost verbatim what was there said by Mr. Rosenwald and by himself. Certainly his statement is substantially correct in every respect. My colleague said considerably more on that occasion than he has said here in giving an account of the interview in his condemnation of an advisory committee or anyone else undertaking to act for the Government and at the same time acting for themselves, all of which I fully approved.

Mr. GORE rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Might I ask the Senator——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator from Illinois in just a moment. I yield now to the Senator from Oklahoma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been sitting here quite a long while, but nobody has known it.

Mr. GORE. Of course, too, Senators will indulge the presumption that the language was entirely parliamentary; but I wanted to ask the Senator from Tennessee or the Senator from Illinois to tell the business connection of this saintly gentleman.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I can not state what it is. I must be very much of an ignoramus; I am not very familiar with great men. I suppose I argue myself unknown, but I never heard of Mr. Julius Rosenwald until a short time ago, when I saw his name in the papers as being a member of this commission. I have no knowledge of him of any kind, nature, or description. I do not know what his business connection is, I do not know what his history is, and I have not the slightest feeling of any kind, nature, or description in regard to him.

I want to say to the Senator that I never would have brought up this subject, inasmuch as this was purely a business visit of my friends and myself to the offices of Mr. Rosenwald, and not even to see him but to see another very delightful gentleman that we met there; and while there we were invited in to meet Mr. Rosenwald and other members of the board, and then this conversation occurred. I did not intend to have a word to say about that conversation and would not have done so but for this publication, in which Mr. Rosenwald seems to charge very dire things against Members of the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, may I ask the Senator——

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator has rendered a public service——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would really like to be recognized once in a while and have some rights under the rules of the Senate. Senators rise and proceed to discuss matters without the slightest attention to the Chair. Either the present occupant of the chair is going to vacate the chair or somebody is going to pay some attention to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma next.

Mr. GORE. With the Chair's permission, I will say that I think the Senator from Tennessee has rendered a public service in detailing this conversation. I am anxious to get in the RECORD, if I can, the business connection of Mr. Rosenwald, and I will ask the Senator from Illinois to give us that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Illinois to give that information.

Mr. GORE. I want to know on what meat this Daniel who has come to judgment has fed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know anything about him; and I now yield to the Senator from Illinois to give the explanation to the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President. I do know Mr. Julius Rosenwald. I never have borne any intimate connection with Mr. Rosenwald. He is a prominent business man of my city. He is the head of the large house—the parcels-post house, as we may speak of it—of Sears, Roebuck & Co. He has been known for many charities and great generosities and as a man of large wealth. I never heard him charged with a dishonorable act. Knowing him as I do in a casual way, I can not believe him guilty of one. I can not believe that he would use this office as a member of the advisory commission for the enrichment of himself. I deplore to hear from these eminent Senators that he could have lost his usual balance and have said to these Senators that he thought the advisory commission, by action of ours, would be put out of business. It would leave the inference on the part of certain people that the advisory commission or the council were there for business. It is to be regretted that any gentleman should leave the impression that as a member of the advisory commission he took the office for business purposes. I can not believe that Mr. Rosenwald could descend to such a course; and I now answer the Senator from Oklahoma.

The reputation of Mr. Rosenwald in the city of Chicago is as a great benefactor, a great business man, and so eminent in the councils of the Republican Party was he that he was chosen as one of the heads to make its campaign in behalf of Mr. Hughes, the candidate; and he occupied such a very high and exalted position that he was on the council of direction in that great contest and has held the confidence of his fellow citizens. I regret that he has done anything that should lose for him the esteem of the Senate. I trust that this whole observation concerning him, which I understood the Senator to read from the newspaper as a quotation from Mr. Rosenwald, may afterwards be disclosed to have been one brought about by a report that really has no foundation in truth. I can not believe he would have descended to that which in itself is absurd, and certainly defenseless.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in order to be entirely fair to Mr. Rosenwald, may I ask the Senator if Mr. Rosenwald or his firm deals in any articles of merchandise which are or might be sold to the Government in any way, such as equipment for the Army and Navy, or anything of that kind? I do not know how it is, but the inference might be that way, and I should be glad to have the Senator explain that on behalf of his friend, if he desires.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, all I can say in that connection is this: The house of Sears, Roebuck & Co. is one of the very large supply houses of America, and I have little doubt but that it engages itself with every form of supply that goes to the household needs of man. It is natural to indulge the thought that, therefore, it may have things for which the Government may have need, but as to whether it has ever supplied the Government, or sought to do so, I have no information whatever.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask this: The Senator, from his knowledge of Mr. Rosenwald, would feel assured that Mr. Rosenwald, acting as chairman of this department, would not permit his house to sell anything like clothing supplies or any other supplies dealt in by him to the Government at such a time; would he not?

Mr. LEWIS. I say to the Senator, having been opposed to Mr. Rosenwald in every office for which I contended, being opposed by all the interests which he represents, I can not be said to be a prejudicial witness in his behalf; but it is my sincere conviction that he is a man who would not tender his own business to the Government out of which to make profits, and that he would not, while he was on the advisory commission, attempt to benefit his business or himself by any opportunity that might be afforded him. Such is my personal judgment of a gentleman toward whom I have borne an acquaintance such as I have described.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. In order to clear up the connection of Mr. Rosenwald with the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, allow me to read from the document which was presented by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] a few days ago and which he caused to be printed and given to the Senate.

On page 55, under the heading "Council of National Defense," is found the list of the council:

The Secretary of War, Mr. Baker; the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels; the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane; the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston; the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield; the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson.

Advisory commission of Council of National Defense: Daniel Willard (chairman), transportation and communication; Howard E. Coffin, munitions and manufacturing, including standardization and industrial relations; Julius Rosenwald, supplies, including clothing, etc.

Turning to page 60, I find this:

Committees of and cooperating with Mr. Rosenwald—

That is to say, "Committees of Mr. Rosenwald," I take it—

Committee on supplies: Julius Rosenwald, chairman; Stanley King, secretary and director of W. H. McElwain Co.; Charles Eisenman, retired; H. M. Kelso, Sears, Roebuck & Co.; T. W. Cloney, Quaker Oats Co.; E. O. Heyl, Libby, McNeil & Libby.

Now the cooperative committee on cotton goods: There follows a long list of names. I do not want to take the time of the Senate to read them, but I ask leave to print them.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Cooperative committee on cotton goods: Lincoln Grant, Wellington-Sears Co., New York, chairman; Harry L. Bailey, Wellington-Sears Co., New York; A. F. Bemis, president National Association Cotton Manufacturers; Fuller E. Calloway, La Grange, Ga.; Elisha Cronkhite, Smith, Hogg & Co., New York; E. F. Greene, Pacific Mills, Boston, Mass., Eustis L. Hopkins, Bliss, Fabyan & Co., New York; William D. Judson, 78 Leonard Street, New York; J. Harper Poor, Amory, Browne & Co., New York; W. H. Prankard, Amoskeag Manufacturing Co., Boston, Mass.; John E. Rousmaniere, J. Spencer Turner & Co., New York; Spencer Turner, Turner-Halsey Co., New York; Ridley Watts, Watts, Stebbins & Co., New York.

Mr. REED. Then there is the cooperative committee on woolen manufactures and a long list of names, which I ask to have printed.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Cooperative committee on woolen manufactures: John P. Wood, William Wood & Co., Philadelphia, chairman; Spaulding Bartlett, S. Slater & Sons, Webster, Mass.; Robert T. Francis, Ponteesue Woolen Manufacturing Co., New York; George C. Hetzel, C. C. Hetzel Co., Chester, Pa.; Winthrop L. Marvin, National Association Wool Manufacturers, Boston, Mass.; Moses L. Shuttleworth, American Woolen Co., New York; Nathaniel Stevens, M. T. Stevens & Sons, North Andover, Mass.; Charles H. Wilson, J. & E. H. Wilson, Pittsfield, Mass.

Mr. REED. Then, there is the cooperative committee on shoe and leather industries, with a long list of names, which I ask to have printed.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Cooperative committee on shoe and leather industries: J. F. McElwain, W. H. McElwain Co., Boston, Mass., chairman; John A. Bush, Brown Shoe Co., St. Louis, Mo.; W. G. Garrett, Central Leather Co., Boston, Mass.; Charles P. Hall, American Hide & Leather Co., Boston, Mass.; George F. Johnson, Endicott-Johnson Co., Binghamton, N. Y.; John Kent, M. A. Packard Shoe Co., Brockton, Mass.; H. Frederick Lesh, Kistler-Lesh Co., Boston, Mass.; August Vogel, Pfister-Vogel Leather Co., Milwaukee, Wis.

Mr. REED. The next is the cooperative committee on knit goods, which I also ask to have printed.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Cooperative committee on knit goods: Lincoln Cromwell, William Iselin & Co., New York, chairman; Frank H. Burgher, 32 Thomas Street, New York; J. S. Carr, jr., president Durham Hosiery Mills, Durham, N. C.; Andrew Frey, vice president Onieta Knitting Mills, Utica, N. Y.; Leo M. Flesh, Atlas Underwear Co., Piqua, Ohio; E. I. Goodrich, Clift-Goodrich Co., New York; Frederick S. Haight, 61 Worth Street, New York; Henry Pope, Paramount Knitting Mills, Chicago, Ill.; Rufus W. Scott, William F. Taubel, New York.

Mr. REED. So it would appear that Mr. Rosenwald is not here merely in his individual capacity, but that he is the head of a number of committees handling other activities, covering a large number of things.

Who's Who of 1917 has this to say of Mr. Julius Rosenwald:

Julius Rosenwald, merchant; Springfield, Ill.—

It gives his birth, and so forth—senior member Rosenwald & Weil, clothiers.

Observe that he is the chairman of the committee on supplies, including clothing.

Then follows a list of a large number of charitable organizations to which he belongs, and the statement of some of his charitable acts.

The article concludes:

Home: 4901 Ellis Avenue. Office: Sears Roebuck & Co., Chicago, Ill.

I think this sufficiently identifies the gentleman.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have already taken more of the time of the Senate than I intended when I arose, and will hurry through what I shall have to say.

Section 9 of the bill is merely an addition to section 8, and gives to the Government the right to requisition any of the packing houses or factories or mines that might be necessary to carry out the provisions of section 8. It is rather an enlargement of the powers of section 8, and I think it is a section that should be enacted into law. If we are going to give the President the authority, we ought to give him sufficient authority to make the purpose intended effective.

Section 10 is the section to which I want to call the attention of Senators most earnestly. That is, in my judgment, a slipshod way of dealing with the most vital thing in this bill, and that is the food speculator:

That undue enhancement or fluctuation of prices of or injurious speculation in—

Now, those of us who are lawyers know that it is very difficult to determine what is "undue" enhancement of prices or "injurious" speculation. What might be held or considered by one judge to be injurious speculation in one instance would be held to be wholly of a proper character by another judge and in another instance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. With pleasure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee at its last meeting authorized me to report an amendment which strikes out the following words in section 10 after the first word "That":

Undue enhancement or fluctuation of prices of, or injurious speculation in, or unjust market manipulation, or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries are hereby prohibited, and.

So that it will read:

That whenever the President finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in—

And so forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think that improves the section very much. It may, because it leaves it entirely in the hands of the President. As I said before, I think that is the duty of Congress in the premises, and it is a duty we ought to deal with directly. We ought to deal with this question of speculation directly and not through the agency of the President. We ought not to unload on the President this question. Some men think we ought not to legislate about speculation at all, that the speculators ought to regulate themselves. Others think that we had better get rid of it, and the easiest way is just to unload it on the President. The chances are the President will not do anything with it.

The gamblers and speculators who are sending prices skyward at the expense of the consumers of the country are hoping to avoid any trouble, that the President may overlook them, or his agent may overlook them, or he may think it would take so long to investigate them to find out which ones are injurious speculators and which ones are harmful speculators that nothing will be done. Some Senators think that if we put in a straight-out provision somewhat after the manner of the Thomas amendment, which was offered by the distinguished Senator from Colorado, it will have the effect of driving out the speculators, and that is what we ought to do. We ought to do it directly. We ought not to turn it over to the President to investigate and to find out what is harmful speculation and what is not harmful speculation. If we are going to adopt that sort of legislation why not adopt it all along the line? Why should we take the trouble to investigate what laws should be passed or what laws should not be passed? When we come to a question why not just turn it over to the President to examine and report and pass upon it and put a penalty on it? That is no way to legislate. It ought not to be put in the bill in that way. It is a bad policy of government. It is a policy of government that may lead to ruin of the Republic if we keep it up. We ought to do it directly and fairly and pass upon these questions ourselves.

For my part, I am not going to stand up here and in one breath abuse the food speculators and then go right on and vote with them, because they all want this kind of a provision. They want to have the same kind of regulation that the various business men of the country are having in the Council of National Defense.

They want to gather together here in Washington and pass upon the question themselves as to who are engaged in injurious and speculative business and who are not, licensing some and not licensing others. It opens the door to all kinds of fraud and wrong that may be perpetrated not only upon our Government but upon the people of this country. I shall propose, unless the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] does so, the straight-cut, matter of fact, effective legislation that he offered by way of an amendment to the last food bill, and which in my judgment the Senate made a mistake by not adopting.

Now, so much for that. I next come to section 11, and that is the guarantee section, the minimum-price guarantee. I hope Senators will listen to this proposition that I have to make about that. I think the committee has worked out a very excellent provision along that line, just about as good probably as could be prepared with just one exception. I ask Senators to look at the bill on page 16, line 14, the word "profit." This is a very important power that we are conferring on the food controller. It is a power that ought to be exercised most carefully. It is the greatest power that possibly ever was exercised by any Government official. My suggestion is to add after the word "profit" a colon, and then the following:

Provided, That before fixing any reasonable guaranteed price for any such products the said board shall make a careful investigation into all the facts, and prepare a record of their findings on such facts, and submit said record of findings with their recommendations thereon to the President of the United States personally, and if he shall indorse said findings, then such reasonable guaranteed price for any such products may be fixed, but not otherwise.

Now, what will be the effect of that amendment? It is simply to make it more effective. Senators know that there are a good many who will complain of the use of this word, and that it is a very extraordinary power we are conferring. Now, we are conferring it upon a board. Some board, some body of men, are going to fix the guaranteed price under that provision. It will bring about dissatisfaction, it makes no difference what they do; but would it not add to the satisfaction the country will have, to the confidence the country will have in it, if this board, before fixing a price, shall submit their finding to the President of the United States for approval and he pass upon it personally? I think it would add to the section, and I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will accept that amendment and put it in the bill. I believe it will add very materially to it. I believe the country will accept any guaranteed price that the President of the United States personally passes upon, because they have the utmost confidence in his ability and in his integrity and in his desire to do exactly right on all matters that are submitted to him, and for that reason I have offered the amendment.

Hurrying on, I now come to the next section, and that is the prohibition section, which I have already discussed. I am not going to discuss it further, because I think we have all made up our minds what we are going to do about it. I have made up my mind, and I shall vote for it, lobby or no lobby on either side, influence or no influence from any source. I shall vote my personal convictions on the matter. When I was a candidate for the office of Senator in Tennessee I made the statement that I would support prohibition legislation, which was desired by a vast majority of the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. I made that promise openly, fairly, squarely, and I am going to live up to it just as openly, just as fairly, and just as squarely as I know how, and I am going to vote for the "driest" amendment that can be offered to the bill. I believe at this time such a vote is the best vote for all our people.

I next come to section 13, which is a corollary, and, of course, goes along with it. With all the other sections I have no quarrel at all. On the contrary, I desire to express my appreciation at the good work of the committee in working it out.

In conclusion I have this to say, that there is one omission in the bill that I think ought to be cured. The President of the United States in recommending food legislation gave, as I recall, as the first reason for it that whatever board was constituted should have the power to buy for foreign Governments, for our allies and the neutral Governments. Manifestly, the board consituted here ought to have that authority. It is absolutely necessary. One of the great causes of high prices is the fact that foreign Governments have sent their agents here with instructions to buy wheat and to buy corn and to buy other food productions at any price that might be agreed upon. They sent them here without any reference to our own condition, to our own prices, to our own supplies. They were sent here and they have purchased at the very best prices they could obtain. What was the result? The result was that all these purchases by foreign Governments, both for allies and neutrals, had the effect of running the prices skyward. It is manifest, as is pointed out by the President, that this board should be given authority to buy all the supplies for our allies and for the neutrals at a time when it would not affect our own trade and our own commerce, and would not affect adversely the prices of our own supplies, and not buy them at a time when it would send the prices up.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Does not the Senator think that the board in making its purchases would largely regulate the prices so as to dispense with the necessity of any guaranteed price?

Mr. McKELLAR. I feel sure that there should be the appointment of such a board to deal with our surplus crop. Of course there is no doubt there is plenty being raised in our own country for our own people, for our own Army, and for our own Navy, but the great question is to feed our allies, to support our allied armies and nations. Manifestly, we ought to go about this matter of purchasing our surplus for our allies and for the neutral countries in a businesslike way. We ought not to go about it in a slipshod way, in an indirect way.

I am going to offer this amendment, which I hope will carry out the idea I have. If it does not, and if some other Senator offers a better one, I shall be glad to support it.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator believe that under the bill an agency could not be created?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; an agency could be created, of course; but we want one of the right kind.

Mr. KENYON. I thought section 2 covered it.

Mr. McKELLAR. But here is what we are going to do about that. I may be unduly prejudiced, but I have the advisory board of the Council of National Defense uppermost in my mind. I am afraid of that kind of legislation, and for that reason while I think unquestionably the food commissioner could establish a board under the broad provisions of this act, Congress ought to do so directly. I do not think we ought to permit a food commissioner to legislate for us. I think we ought to do it directly, and for that reason I am going to offer an amendment which I have already had printed. It is as follows:

SEC. —. That it shall be the duty of such board as may be created under this act, and it is hereby fully authorized and empowered, to take over and transact the entire business of buying necessaries and selling necessaries, as defined in this act, to the allies of the United States during the war, and no necessaries may be bought by any foreign allied government, by its agents or representatives, or by any neutral government, its agents, or representatives, save through the agency of said board under limitations, rules, and regulations to be established by the President from time to time during the emergency. The said board shall not charge any allied government any profit or commission for its service, but it shall charge the actual cost and expense of the service rendered. It is hereby declared to be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to sell any necessaries to any allied or neutral foreign government, its agents, or representatives, and a violation of this section shall subject the offender to a fine of not less than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both, for each offense.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. The amendment the Senator offers does not provide for the appointment of a board any different from that provided in section 2.

Mr. McKELLAR. The reason why that was done was that when I prepared this section I was very much in hopes the Committee on Agriculture would see the necessity of establishing a board in the first section of the bill, and I thought in the powers of that board should be included the power to deal with purchases for foreign governments.

I will say to the Senator, and he is on the committee, that here the President of the United States recommends that this legislation be passed and the very first thing he recommends is the establishment of a board to do the buying for the allied governments. It is so apparent that there ought to be such a board I take it no Senator can undertake to say there should not be such a board, and yet the bill has hardly any direct reference to any such board. It is one of the most important things to be accomplished by the bill, and that board ought to be a constitutional board, it ought to be a responsible board, it ought to be a board that has no other interest to serve except the interests of this Government and its people. It ought not to be a board composed of men who sell to foreign governments themselves. It ought to be a board of men about whom there can not be any question of their good faith. I believe the statement made in the Bible that it is well to avoid the appearance of evil. Now, in this time of war, when our country is torn up, when we have almost hysteria among some people at times, we ought to be exceedingly careful to avoid the appearance of evil, so that there can not be any question about the good faith and honesty of the acts of the agents of the United States.

For that reason I think we ought to have a board duly constituted under the law, appointed by the President, confirmed by the Senate, as the Constitution says we must do. We ought to have such a board as that for this all-important work of buying for the allied Governments of the world. I think there can not be any answer to that, and I do not believe my distinguished friend from Idaho, whom I love very dearly, has an answer to it; and I now yield to him.

Mr. BRADY. The point I wish to make is this: The Senator's amendment is a very good one, but it will not apply to this bill unless he first creates a board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course it is in general language. If my amendment for the creation of a board in the first section is lost, then I shall move to change the word "board" into "agency," and require the agency of the Government established under the bill to buy and sell for the allies. It is an important section. This is one of the most important things we have to deal with. It will have more to do with the establishment of fixed prices and to bring about stationary prices of the products of our country than anything else. It will absolutely deal with the situation if it is properly handled, and we ought to be exceedingly careful about it so that the very highest class board is found for this all-important work. The Senator from Idaho is a member of the committee, and it may be that he can tell me why the committee did not provide for it in terms.

Mr. BRADY. The explanation the Senator from Idaho makes is that the bill was before the committee as a food-control bill, with a distinct understanding that it was the intent and purpose of the President to appoint Mr. Hoover as the chairman of the board to manage or control the food in our country during the war. The question was not discussed at length at all relative to the creation of the board.

The Senator's suggestion is a splendid one if it can be enacted, but I am afraid it would only delay the bill. On the other hand, permit me to say that the amendment he offers will not remedy the situation. The only thing that will remedy it is to add a provision limiting the board as an agency, having first provided for the appointment of the board by the President and its confirmation by the Senate, but the bill was simply for the control of the food situation and of speculation, and naturally it drifted off to a great many things that were not originally in the bill.

As to section 3, I may say that that section was put in by the unanimous vote of the committee and it expresses the sentiment of the committee. It applies not only to one member of the committee but to all, and we are willing to accept the consequences.

The amendment can not be utilized to advantage in the form that it is at present. I would suggest to the Senator, before presenting the amendment, that he add a section creating the board and consolidate the two amendments into one. I believe it would then receive much more favorable consideration from the committee, and I think it is a very good suggestion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will make my amendment conform to the bill, so as to effect the purpose which we have been discussing, and I hope the Senator will vote for it and that other Senators will do so.

Mr. President, I believe I have said all and more than I intended to say on this bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma with pleasure.

Mr. GORE. Before the Senator closes I wish to say in connection with his remarks that I entirely agree with him that whoever is to exercise these vast, these unexampled powers, ought to be an officer of the United States; that he ought to be a responsible officer; he ought to be confirmed by the Senate; and he ought to be required to report to the Congress of the United States as to the discharge of his official duties.

If Mr. Hoover be appointed in pursuance of this act, he will have no official status; he will not be an officer of this Government; neither he nor anyone associated with him would be liable to impeachment for misfeasance or malfeasance or nonfeasance—whatever those terms may mean—in regard to his official duties. I entirely agree with the Senator from Tennessee as to that.

I may say that I have introduced a separate measure—joint resolution 62—creating an office and an officer to discharge these powers. which are only equaled by the Czar's, the Kaiser's, or the Sultan's; but I conferred with some of my associates on the matter, and I did not offer the measure as an amendment to this bill because it was suggested that it might delay the report. I was not willing to delay the report even for a moment; but I have intended to offer that joint resolution as an amendment to this measure. I hope that it or the Senator's amendment or some other amendment will be adopted that will fix the official responsibility of those who are to exercise these unexampled and unprecedented powers.

Mr. McKELLAR. I take it also that the Senator from Oklahoma is old-fashioned enough to believe that when the Government appropriates $152,500,000, as is proposed to be done in this bill, and turns it over to some one else to spend, it is as little as we can do to have a duly sworn and bonded officer to disburse so important an amount. Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. I think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have said more than I started out to say. I wish to again assure the Senate that, so far as I am concerned, I shall not in any manner delay or do anything that would tend to delay the early passage of this bill. I believe something ought to be done, and that it ought to be done as quickly as possible in this direction. I think time is of the essence of the matter. I approve of most of the provisions of the bill, and I think by amendment we can get a bill with which most of the people of our country will be entirely satisfied. I think that the discussion that has been had—prior to this date at any rate—has been of great good in determining just what should go into the bill. I, for one, most heartily approve of the proposed legislation, taken as a whole, and hope that it will soon be the law.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rather regret that the discussion concerning the advisory commission to the Council of National Defense has arisen in connection with this food-control bill. I regret it, not because I deprecate the discussion, and not because I do not think that it is the duty of Congress and the desire of the country to know all that is to be known in relation to the operations of this advisory commission, and, indeed, of the council itself, but I fear that it raises a subject of such reach and ramifications that, if we treat it with the exhaustiveness with which we ought to treat it, it will necessarily operate to delay the passage of this very important bill.

Mr. President, I think there has been a dearth of information as to the operation of this advisory council, and I have here a report from the director of the advisory council made to the Secretary of War, dated the 28th of May, but which was only released for publication on the 25th of June, and has, I think, received only very scant attention in the press, because perhaps it is not very brief and not particularly adapted to newspaper needs as news. It is, however, very informing. It goes into considerable detail in the effort to analyze and to give to the country a clear view of all the things which have been accomplished by this very necessary commission. I am sending the report to the desk and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The first page contains the names of the different committees into which the body is divided. They are arranged in the form of a diagram, which I shall not ask, of course, that the Printing Office attempt to reproduce. It can only print the lines, and so forth, between the names. If they have the diagram set up at the Printing Office, of course, it could be advantageous to use it. I should like to have the report of the matter which I have sent to the desk printed in the RECORD, not in the very fine type in which the printer usually sets up quotations and which is very difficult for most people to read, but in the ordinary type of the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the report which he presents is accompanied with illustrations?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is not a single thing in it in the way of an illustration. I did not know but that the matter might be held up on account of the marked lines and diagrams in which the first page is set up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD in the ordinary type.

The report referred to is as follows:

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE (organized by act of Congress Aug. 29, 1916):

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 29, 1917.

A REPORT FROM THE DIRECTOR OF THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE AND OF ITS ADVISORY COMMISSION TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL.

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, May 28, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War and Chairman of the Council of National Defense.

SIR: Herein I have the honor to hand you a statement of the organization and accomplishments of the Council of National Defense, its advisory commission, and the various boards, sections, and committees under both the council and the commission.

As an introductory statement, a few of the accomplishments in question may be concretely instanced as follows:

The mobilization of the 262,000 miles of railroads of the country for the Government's defense.

The close-knit organization of the telephone and telegraph companies of America to insure to the Government the most rapid and efficient wire communications.

The settlement of the recent threatened national railroad strikes.

The very general acceptance by labor and capital of the suggestion of the council that existing labor standards should not be changed until the need for such action had been determined by the council, with the steadying influence on industry growing out of such action.

The procurement of 45,000,000 pounds of copper for the uses of the Army and Navy of the United States at less than one-half of the then current market price—a saving to the Government of approximately $10,000,000.

Similar accomplishments as to steel, zinc, and aluminum.

The completion of the inventory, for military purposes, of 27,000 American manufacturing plants.

The money saving to the Government, through appointment over the country of committees of business men to assist the Quartermaster's Department of the Army in the economical and efficient purchase of supplies.

The saving to the Government of millions of dollars by the proper coordination of purchases through the agency of the general munitions board of the Council of National Defense.

The creation, under the medical section of the council, of a general medical board, consisting of many of the most highly qualified surgeons and physicians of the country.

The selection by the same section of thousands of doctors specifically qualified for membership in the Medical Officers' Reserve Corps, and the standardization, far on its way to completion, of surgical instruments and supplies.

The creation by the council of the aircraft production board, which is setting out to make 3,500 airplanes and to train 6,000 aviators this year.

The very definite results obtained by the council's committee on coal production in the procurement and expeditious shipment of coal, both in the civilian and Federal interests.

The successful initiation of a movement to coordinate activities on the part of the States of the Union for the national defense, brought to a clear and workable focus by the conference of States held recently in Washington at the call and under the auspices of the council.

The organization of a railroad committee to send to Russia.

The enlistment of reserve engineer regiments to aid in rehabilitating the railroads of France.

Such a summary excludes very many accomplishments detailed in the body of the report.

The Council of National Defense, though created under the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, was not fully organized for business until March 1, 1917. Since that date its record has been one of steady, consistent growth.

The duties and functions of the council as defined by the act of Congress which created it are, briefly stated, as follows:

In the terms of the act the council is, among other things, charged with the "coordination of industries and resources for the national security and welfare," and with the "creation of relations which will render possible in the time of need the immediate concentration and utilization of the resources of the Nation."

In performing its functions the council is further charged with the following duties:

1. To supervise and direct investigation and make recommendations to the President and the heads of executive departments as to—

(a) The location of railroads with reference to the frontier of the United States, so as to render possible expeditious concentration of troops and supplies to points of defense.

(b) The coordination of military, industrial, and commercial purposes in the location of extensive highways and branch lines of railroads.

(c) The utilization of waterways.

(d) The mobilization of military and naval resources for defense.

(e) The increase of domestic production of articles and materials essential to the support of armies and of the people during the interruption of foreign commerce.

(f) The development of seagoing transportation.

(g) Data as to amounts, location, method, and means of production and availability of military supplies.

(h) The giving of information to producers and manufacturers as to the class of supplies needed by the military and other services of the Government, the requirements relating thereto, and the creation of relations which will render possible in time of need the immediate concentration and utilization of the resources of the Nation.

2. To report to the President or to the heads of executive departments upon special inquiries or subjects appropriate thereto.

3. To submit an annual report to Congress, through the President, giving as full a statement of the activities of the council and the agencies subordinate to it as is consistent with the public interest, including an itemized account of the expenditures made by the council, or authorized by it, in as full detail as the public interest will permit, providing, however, that when deemed proper the President may authorize, in amounts stipulated by him, unvouchered expenditures, and report the gross so authorized not itemized.

Specific reference is hereinabove had to section 2 of the Army appropriation act, approved August 29, 1916. In this section will be found the authority for the creation of an advisory commission of seven persons to act with, under, and by authority of the council.

The Council of National Defense is composed as follows:

Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, Chairman.
Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels.
Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane.
Secretary of Agriculture, David F. Houston.
Secretary of Commerce, William C. Redfield.
Secretary of Labor, William B. Wilson.

The members of the advisory commission are:

Daniel Willard, chairman, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, in particular charge of transportation and communication.

Howard E. Coffin, vice president of the Hudson Motor Co., in particular charge of munitions, manufacturing, including standardization and industrial relations.

Julius Rosenwald, president of Sears, Roebuck & Co., in particular charge of supplies, including clothing.

Bernard M. Baruch, financier, in particular charge of raw materials, minerals, and metals.

Dr. Hollis Godfrey, president of the Drexel Institute, in particular charge of engineering and education.

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in particular charge of labor, including conservation of health and welfare of workers.

Dr. Franklin Martin, secretary general of the American College of Surgeons, in particular charge of medicine, surgery, and sanitation.

The director of the council and Advisory Commission is Walter S. Gifford, and the secretary of the council and Advisory Commission is Grosvenor B. Clarkson.

Under both council and commission there have been created various boards, sections, and committees. The work and accomplishments of the subordinate bodies under the council will herein first be dealt with.

THE GENERAL MUNITIONS BOARD.

On April 9, 1917, the general munitions board began its work under orders of the Council of National Defense. Its chairman is Frank A. Scott, vice president of the Warner & Swasey Co., an acknowledged authority in the production of munitions for the uses of modern war, and is composed of 17 qualified representatives of the War and Navy Departments and 6 civilians, exclusive of the chairman. It should be stated that prior to the organization of the board the War and Navy Departments might compete with each other in the open market, and even within these two great departments certain subdepartments might compete with each other. The work under the board of coordinating the departmental buying has, of course, eliminated any outstanding cases of this nature. The method adopted is simply to furnish a clearing house for the orders that involve material in which a national shortage exists or is anticipated. Where manufacturing facilities are insufficient, the board directs its efforts to developing new facilities.

The subjects dealt with by the board and some of the results so far obtained are as follows:

Small arms—Rifle contracts: Conferences with manufacturers held; enough capacity to supply 1,000,000 men developed; contract form drawn satisfactory to and signed by Chief of Ordnance.

Small arms—Ammunition contracts: Contracts covering supply of ammunition for small arms have been drawn and a sufficient amount and suitable deliveries have been secured.

Artillery—Ammunition: Conferences with manufacturers held; general price situation discussed; specifications in some cases modified; sufficient supply developed; and type of contract to be used arrived at.

Gun forgings: Conferences with manufacturers held; expansion of manufacturing facilities developed; method for reimbursing manufacturers for expansion satisfactory to manufacturers arranged for; manufacture of guns already begun.

Machining of gun forgings 3 inch to 6 inch: Conferences with manufacturers held; possible sources of supply discovered and developed; sufficient facilities found.

Gun carriages, limbers, caissons, forge wagons: Conferences with manufacturers held; sources of supply in process of development; and raw material secured.

Military vehicles, aside from motor transport: Conferences with manufacturers held; sufficient sources of supply developed; specifications modified and standardized; seasoned timber secured.

Motor transport, including ambulances and armored cars: Conferences held with manufacturers; standardization of type secured; supply of material for ambulance bodies arranged for. A satisfactory production of armored cars was arranged for by the Ordnance Department.

Machine guns: A reduction in prices to be paid for machine guns needed for the Army and Navy has been secured, accomplished by conferences with manufacturers. Work is going forward to increase production of these guns.

Armor-piercing shells: A method for payment on the various size projectiles was developed and suggested.

Cotton duck for tentage, cots, and Infantry equipment: Manufacturers of cotton duck were assisted in creating a sufficient supply of duck for haversacks in time to meet the needs of the Army.

Raw materials, including metals, lumber, leather, high explosives: Committees on these subjects have taken the necessary steps toward securing a sufficient supply.

Medical supplies, including surgical instruments: Conferences with manufacturers were held and means for reducing the requirements of the civil and Army and Navy branches to a minimum were discussed. The supply of surgical instruments, etc., is being arranged for.

Stores work: Arrangements have been made for the tuition of large numbers of men anxious to enter the storage branch of the service; storage bases have likewise been developed.

Cantonment work: Form of contract has been drawn satisfactory to Quartermaster Department and contractors. Certain suggestions have likewise been submitted to facilitate construction and create a saving.

Optical glass—Military instruments: After thorough investigation a shortage of this material was found, and steps are now being taken to standardize and eliminate instruments not absolutely necessary and to arrange for increased production.

Recommendations of fair and just prices: The board has been called upon to make recommendations upon prices submitted the Army and Navy and Quartermaster Department as to whether these prices were fair and just. In each case these recommendations have been made.

Adjustment with British Government on small-arm factories in this country: An adjustment has been made with the British Government covering purchase by the United States Government of machinery and equipment in British small-arms factories in this country.

Program of conferences with English commissioners: The secretary of the board has arranged a program of conferences between representatives of various War and Navy Departments and the visiting British commissioners to discuss various technical subjects pertaining to their departments.

Establishment of priority in machine-tool orders and demand for other material: In cases when called upon by the Army and Navy, this board has instructed certain manufacturers to give precedence to machine tools desired in connection with urgent governmental work, and likewise has decided between the needs of private industry and those of the War and Navy Departments.

Investigation of gauges: This board has investigated the status of military material in this country and in Canada; arrangements have been made with the Bureau of Standards for calibrating gauges and for the care and custody of master gauges.

Compilation of statistics: A confidential list of approximately 660 manufacturers of munition and kindred articles has been prepared and submitted to the War and Navy Departments for their guidance in purchasing such material.

The General Munitions Board has, since its organization, through the coordination of purchasing alone, saved many millions of dollars to the Government.

MUNITIONS STANDARDS BOARD.

On March 20, 1917, the Council of National Defense formally created the munitions standards board, previously organized by Commissioner Coffin, the advisory member on munition work, its purpose being to standardize munitions specifications, and, in so far as possible, to permit of quantity production of munitions at the most reasonable prices obtainable. The following experts were appointed to compose the board:

Frank A. Scott, of the Warner & Swasey Co., Cleveland, manufacturers of automatic machinery and optical instruments, chairman.

W. H. Vandervoort, of Root & Vandervoort, builders of special machine tools, and president of the Moline Automobile Co.

E. A. Deeds, formerly general manager of the National Cash Register Co., president of the Dayton Engineering Co., and interested in many industrial activities.

Francis Pratt, of the General Electric Co., Schenectady.

Samuel Vauclain, of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, Remington and Westinghouse Co.

John N. Otterson, vice president, Winchester Arms Co.

Careful investigations have been made and meetings held with manufacturers of shells, machine guns, etc., with resulting introduction of modifications in specification and design to permit of greater quantity of production. A comprehensive list of manufacturing concerns who had been and were manufacturing munitions for the allies was compiled for confidential use, and the productive capacity of the country along these lines was developed and tabulated.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION BOARD.

The council authorized this board, as organized by Commissioner Coffin, to proceed with this program in accordance with the plan hereinafter set forth:

1. Engineering: To cooperate with the plane and engine design departments of the Army and Navy, with all manufacturers, engineering laboratories, private, individual, etc., to advance the science of aviation and aerostation, and to stimulate the production of a better type of aircraft.

2. Specifications and standardization: To advise and assist in such standardization of material and parts and, as far as is practicable, of types of aircraft as will aid in increasing the productive capacity of the industry in the most efficient forms of aircraft.

3. Production: To investigate the source of supply of aircraft of all kinds and the materials entering into them and to assist in the formulation and execution of such plans as may be necessary to enable the Government to purchase all kinds of aircraft of the types and in the quantities desired.

This will cover advice in connection with:

(a) Coordination of designs of all aircraft matters through the officers of the allied countries stationed here for that purpose.

(b) Arrangements with existing American factories as to kinds of aircraft best suited to their organizations and facilities and quantities to be built by them.

(c) Suitable arrangements when necessary to advance Government funds where larger contracts are considered than can be privately financed or to make arrangements on a cost-plus basis.

(d) Utilization of such idle facilities and creation of such new sources of supply as in the judgment of the board are necessary to meet the needs of the Government.

4. Inspection: To cooperate with the inspection organizations of the Army and Navy and to assist in coordinating their present systems of inspection to the end that if possible there be one system, one standard, and one organization for the inspection of aircraft in this country.

5. Aviation schools: Following the selection of sites by the military departments, to advise in regard to buying or leasing the land, preparing it for use, and erecting all buildings.

6. Supply depots: Following the approval of sites, to advise in regard to leasing the land, erecting the necessary buildings.

7. Priority: To advise regarding priority of deliveries of aircraft material as between the departments in accordance with a general policy as determined by the Council of National Defense.

A condensed report of the work already accomplished in connection with aircraft production under the aircraft production board or under direction of its chairman previous to organization of the board itself follows:

Assisted in the organization of the Pan American Aeronautical Exposition in New York last February.

Assisted in organizing the aircraft manufacturers into an association.

Negotiated with the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation and Curtis Aeroplane Co. and others to secure a basis for the settlement of the airplane patent situation. Agreement has been reached between the parties at interest subject to the preparation of proper legal cross-licensing agreement.

Evolved, in cooperation with the chief signal officer, a training plan for aviators.

Assembled the presidents of six military engineering universities and assisted in starting six schools for the preliminary training of aviator cadets.

Arranged for the sending of professors to take instruction at Toronto on this cadet-instruction work.

Developed in cooperation with the chief signal officer and the aeronautical division a standard type of aviation school buildings and equipment of buildings.

Arranged for complete working drawings, estimates of cost, etc.

Assisted the aeronautical division in investigating sites for aviation schools.

Investigated the production facilities of aeroplanes in the United States and made recommendations to the chief signal officer covering orders that should be placed at once.

Assisted in the preparation of leases covering training fields authorized by the War Department.

Arranged for standardization of training type of machine between English, Canadian, and United States service.

Plans for battle types of machines are being developed, and orders for machines are actually being placed by the military authorities.

MEDICAL SECTION.

The medical section is under the general supervision of Dr. Franklin H. Martin, of the advisory commission, and in the immediate charge of Dr. F. F. Simpson, who acts as chief of the section.

In ascertaining the civilian medical resources of the country and comparing these resources with the actual resources and personnel of the medical departments of the United States Army, Navy, Public Health Service, and the American National Red Cross the prime need was the careful selection from the civilian medical profession of thoroughly qualified doctors who could be recommended to the Army and Navy as members of the medical officers' reserve corps, a list of these men to be submitted to the Surgeon General for inspection, elimination, and final acceptance of those found desirable. In pursuance of this plan committees were formed in each State and asked to submit a selected group of medical practitioners from their respective sections. These lists were carefully compiled and divided into sections according to ages and specialties, and the names of the selected men were furnished to the Surgeon General. The selection of 21,000 competent physicians has been completed. The men represented by these lists were also given applications for positions in the medical officers' reserve corps, with request that they fill out the blanks and file the applications with the Surgeon General.

The next important duty was to obtain young medical men, preferably recent graduates, for service as medical officers in the Regular Army and Navy Medical Corps. The deans of the various medical schools came to Washington at the instance of the medical section and asked that medical officers of the Army and Navy be detailed to said schools to teach graduating classes the administrative details in connection with medical officers, in order to make available the 3,500 medical students to be graduated in June. This action has resulted in materially filling the gaps in the Regular Army and Navy Medical Corps with men of the most desirable type.

The third problem in rank of importance has been to standardize the various instruments, supplies, and equipment common to the Army, Navy, Public Health Service, and Red Cross, coordinating them with the needs of the civilian medical profession. The necessity for this is obvious when it is known that a large percentage of medical instruments and other supplies are manufactured in Germany, and it was vital to obtain suitable substitutes from American manufacturers. Committees representing the Army, Navy, Public Health Service, and Red Cross and civilian doctors were formed to standardize the existing supply tables and to select those necessary for the proper conduct of the departments. These committees, after many months of work, have formulated their recommendations, and catalogues with the authorized standardized instruments are now being published.

Consultations have been had with the deans of the medical schools of the country in cooperation with the Surgeons General, and arrangements made by which medical schools will continue their regular work and supply the normal output of young medical men, thus, it is hoped, avoiding the disastrous results of other countries flowing from the disorganization of medical schools. There has also been established a method by which, in cooperation with the large civil hospitals of the country, their staffs will be segregated, allowing the younger and more active men to enroll in the Officers' Reserve Corps for duty at the front.

A general medical board, composed of civilian medical men of the highest rank, has been formed, which meets at stated intervals in Washington to advise and cooperate with the Surgeons General of the Army, Navy, Public Health Service, and Red Cross in all matters needing cooperation between these branches and the large civilian medical element. This board, working through subcommittees, is in a position to furnish the very latest information on medical and surgical experience in the European war and from the principal laboratories and research organizations of America, and with regard to the relative desirability of men who are candidates for positions in the Medical Reserve Corps or the regular Medical Corps of the Army and Navy. At the instance of the general medical board the Council of National Defense has taken decisive steps for the hygienic and moral welfare of the soldiers and sailors of the Nation.

The general medical board also aids in the selection of civilians, dentists, and veterinarians for service in the Medical Departments of the Army and Navy.

Finally, the efforts of the medical section have been constructively directed toward aiding the Medical Departments of the Army and Navy in securing the doctors and materials needed for an army of such size as may be created, and to do with the minimum disturbance of civilian doctors, hospitals, medical schools, and manufacturers of medical, surgical, and sanitary supplies. The work of the section is too extensive further to detail here.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

This committee was established on March 29, 1917, to suggest, coordinate, and speed work for the national defense and to avoid duplication of effort in the prosecution of that work. It is composed of a representative from each of the 10 executive departments of the Government, together with a representative of the National Research Council, and the assistant to the director of the Council of National Defense in charge of cooperation with the States. The committee is presided over by the director of the council, who reports the formation of all committees by the council or advisory commission with regard to which the various departments may have valuable information. The director also reports all recommendations and suggestions as to which the different departments can give assistance. This committee meets at least twice a week at the offices of the council. The closest and most effective cooperation is being had between the members of this committee, the work of which has materially aided in tightening up the machinery for the national defense.

INVENTIONS.

[Naval Consulting Board of the United States.]

The Naval Consulting Board of the United States, headed by Thomas A. Edison, and composed of eminent scientists and inventors, acts as a board of inventions for the Council of National Defense. The board is now, and has been for some time, actively engaged in the investigations of plans to counteract the submarine menace.

COMMERCIAL ECONOMY BOARD.

The duties of this board, under the chairmanship of A. W. Shaw, are to ascertain how commercial business may best meet demands made upon it by the war, and how men, supplies, and equipments now employed in trade can be made available for the needs of the Government without impairing the essential services of trade and without unnecessary hardships to the public at large.

The following subjects are already under investigation by the Commercial Economy Board:

(a) Delivery service: To the end of determining how the delivery service of retail stores may be curtailed during the war conferences have been held with representative merchants, and agents of the board have made personal investigation of typical stores in Washington, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and other cities, and a carefully prepared schedule of questions is being sent to several thousand stores in all parts of the country. The work has already disclosed that many retail stores can arrange to release men and equipment from their delivery departments for the Government service.

(b) Other services: The board is investigating other means of economy in the operations of retail stores, looking, for example, to the amelioration of the widespread abuse of return privileges, since in numerous stores 20 per cent of the merchandise sold is returned. In this, as in all related subjects, the board is gathering such information as it can regarding European experience.

In wholesale and manufacturing trade matters the board is, for example, as a result of conferences with the National Wholesale Grocers' Association, gathering information from its members on such subjects as economics in wrapping, packing, reduction in size of catalogues, and the employment of fewer salesmen for handling their trade. Likewise, the board has made local investigations regarding the practice among bakers of taking back unsold bread from retailers, the bread thus taken back being resold, in some cases to the poor, but frequently to the farmers for hog or chicken feed. On this matter the board has addressed an inquiry to more than 400 representative bakers in all parts of the United States.

The commercial economy board has likewise made preliminary investigations of the problems likely to arise from the diversion of certain raw materials from ordinary commercial purposes to the production of military supplies. The Government's orders for blankets and clothing will require a large portion of the available supply of raw wool. Hence, the ordinary commercial demand must be modified.

The commercial economy board holds that to advise consumers now to stop buying the styles of garments and shoes already made would be poor public policy. Preliminary investigation by the board shows that consumers who make purchases now should buy what is on hand in retail stores. The board plans to work with manufacturers and merchants to learn what modifications in styles should be made in future in order to secure economy in the commercial use of materials needed by the Government for the purposes of war.

COOPERATIVE COMMITTEES ON THE PURCHASE OF ARMY SUPPLIES.

[In cooperation with the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.]

At the instance and with the approval of the Council of National Defense, advisory committees of highly qualified business men have been appointed by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States in various cities of the country to cooperate with the local quartermasters. These committees have rendered valuable aid in many different ways in many different localities. The knowledge of business and local traffic conditions possessed by these committees has been of the greatest service to the Government in the purchase of supplies. These committees are constantly supplying the Government with lists of buyers in various lines available for service as inspectors of merchandise. Competent traffic and shipping men to cooperate and advise with the quartermasters are being sought.

COMMITTEE ON COAL PRODUCTION.

Under the chairmanship of F. S. Peabody, president of the Peabody Coal Co., of Chicago, the committee on coal production, recently formed, has already accomplished marked definite results. The Department of Labor, with the assistance of the American Federation of Labor and the cooperation of the committee on coal production, has already settled serious difficulties which have arisen between operators and miners in various localities, notably No. 2 district in Pennsylvania. Conferences have been held with the Department of the Interior, resulting in the issuance of a departmental order discontinuing long hauls of cars carrying coal to Indian schools and agencies when nearby coal sources could as well be used, thus releasing the cars for more important movements. The committee is in constant conference with the Navy Department on the subject of coal for battleships. Action has been taken to increase facilities for handling and storing Government coal at Galveston and Texas City, Tex. Conferences with local coal dealers of Washington, D. C., on the supply of coal for public buildings in Washington, have resulted in a promise from the producers of a sufficient supply to cover the Government's requirements.

Another conference of Lake shippers of coal and ore, railroad representatives, and the representatives of Lake vessels to determine how to consolidate cargoes of coal so as to avoid holding both cars and vessels for the accumulation of individual cargoes, resulted, the committee believes, in a solution of the problem satisfactory to all interests—a solution which will probably increase the ability of shippers, railroads, and vessels to carry to the head of the Lakes some additional two and one-half million tons of coal and bring in return the same tonnage of iron ore.

COMMITTEE ON WOMEN'S DEFENSE WORK.

Under the chairmanship of Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, the committee on women's defense work of the Council of National Defense was created April 21, 1917.

Its plan of organization contemplates coordinating the organized forces of the women of the country for the national defense by working through State organizations now in process of formation. Already a temporary chairman has been appointed for each State of the Union and for the District of Columbia. The temporary chairman is instructed to call into conference at the earliest possible date the presidents, or their representatives, of all State organizations of women, such conferences to be executive in character. Permanent committees will be formed composed of the president of or one representative from each State organization of women willing to cooperate. Each committee shall continue during the war and as long thereafter as the Council of National Defense may direct, and shall constitute, with its committee in counties, cities, and towns, the affiliated representatives of the women's committee of the Council of National Defense for that State. The committee on women's defense work contemplates activity under the following headings:

1. Organization of the State (the elected officers should take charge of the work).
2. Finance.
3. Registration for service.
4. Home relief.
5. Allied relief.
6. Production, conservation, and thrift.
7. Educational propaganda.
8. Protection of women workers—wages, hours, conditions.
9. Conservation of the health and welfare of children.
10. Medical section.
11. Courses of instruction: (a) Current events concerning women's war work; (b) training classes in work for which the State furnishes a demand, such as motor service, wireless telegraphy, etc.
12. Conservation of moral and spiritual forces of the Nation.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL.

At the request of the Council of National Defense the national research council is maintaining in Washington an active committee under the direction of Dr. George E. Hale and Dr. R. A. Millikan, for the purpose of cooperating with the Council of National Defense in matters pertaining to scientific research for the national defense. The national research council has made a close-knit organization of the scientific forces of the country and represents all of the more important scientific bodies, as well as the scientific bureaus of the Government in their research capacities. It was organized by the National Academy of Sciences, at the request of the President of the United States, for the purpose of coordinating and stimulating the research activities in the United States in the fields of science and engineering. The national research council is at present engaged in such investigations as the study of devices for detecting completely submerged submarines and mines; range finders of various types; devices for detecting invisible aircraft and sapping parties; improvements in wireless apparatus and other instruments used with aircraft; military photography; prevention of corrosion and electrolytic action on the hulls of vessels; balloon fabrics; fabrics for Army slickers; new explosives; and utilization of wastes and by-products. The committee on nitrate supply, appointed at the request of the Secretary of War to consider the process to be used by the Government in its plant for producing nitrates for explosives and fertilizers, has submitted a full report. Through the cooperation of the Bureau of Standards and the geophysical laboratory of the Carnegie Institute with glass manufacturers, the problem of supplying the optical glass for military purposes is well advanced toward solution. Other vital matters which are being fully investigated are antitoxins and serums for diphtheria, tetanus, pneumonia, dysentery, and meningitis, intradermal method of vaccinating for smallpox, polyvalent vaccines for typhoid fever, sterilization of drinking water, soldiers' clothing and blankets, infected wounds, shock, fatigue, occupational diseases with special reference to munition workers, protection of the ear from high explosives, and study of noxious gases and methods of protection against them.

COMMITTEE ON SHIPPING.

To advise the United States Shipping Board and to report through the chairman thereof to the Council of National Defense as to the best methods of increasing the tonnage available for shipment to the allies, a committee on shipping has been created by the Council of National Defense.

DEPARTMENT ON COOPERATION WITH STATE ORGANIZATIONS.

Under the direction of the director of the Council of National Defense and in the immediate charge of George F. Porter, an active department has been established which has for its purpose the coordination of State defense activities throughout the Nation. The initial step of this body consisted in a request made by the Secretary of War, in his capacity as chairman of the Council of National Defense, to the governors of all the States to create State councils of defense or similar committees with broad powers to cooperate with the Council of National Defense and to represent the industries, activities, and resources of the several States. A number of States, more particularly those in the East, had previously organized. Others proceeded at once to do so, and records to date show that 35 States have completed such organization. Those State bodies are generally known as State councils of defense, though some of them are called committees of public safety and by other names.

Following this action, there was called, likewise, by the chairman of the Council of National Defense, a conference of the States, consisting of representatives from the State councils, including the governors of 12 Commonwealths, which met in Washington on May 2, 1917, and remained in session for two days. Every State in the Union was represented. The conference was opened by the chairman of the Council of National Defense, and the conferees were later addressed at the White House by the President of the United States. Meetings subsequently held were addressed by the Secretaries of the Navy, the Interior, Labor, and Commerce; by representatives of the Department of Agriculture and by members of the advisory commission and the director. Frank and thoroughgoing explanation was made to the State representatives of the outstanding needs of the Nation in the prosecution of the war with Germany, and specific outline was made as to how the State defense activities could best be linked up with the work of the Federal Government in the most intelligent and efficient coordination for the Nation's defense.

At the conference in question the following resolution, proposed by the representatives from Rhode Island and seconded by the governor of Iowa, was unanimously adopted by these officially accredited representatives from every Commonwealth in the United States and from the District of Columbia:

"We, the representatives of the various States of the Union assembled here in conference by invitation of the Council of National Defense, desire to express our appreciation of the opportunity the council has given us to become more familiar with the Herculean task they are performing and the magnitude of the patriotic work they are accomplishing.

"We desire also to express our entire confidence in their ability to carry to a successful fruition their organized endeavors to assist the Government of the United States in the present emergency and to pledge each our several States to the fullest cooperation in any direction which may suggest itself to the Council of National Defense wherein we as units may be now, or may hereafter, become helpful in this their great national undertaking."

Following the conference, the work of this department has been to collect information as to the organization and activities of the various State councils, to answer a number of formal inquiries submitted thereby, and to provide a means of keeping in intimate touch with the formation and activities of the State councils as well as to furnish a free-flowing and speedy channel of communication between the State councils and the Federal Government.

The department has also prepared and sent to the State councils a transcript in full of the proceedings of the national defense conference, reports and information from the Department of Labor, full information as to the liberty loan, with request that State councils assist in the successful placing thereof (this at the request of the Treasury Department), and information in connection with registration day, along with a request that this day be made one for national celebration.

COMMITTEES OF OR ASSOCIATED WITH THE ADVISORY COMMISSION.

The advisory commission, which is a body of seven civilians appointed by the President, the members of which serve in an advisory capacity without compensation, have formed or caused to be formed various committees. Their duties and accomplishments to date are as follows:

Transportation and communication.

At the instance of Commissioner Daniel Willard the railroads of the country have been completely mobilized for the Nation's defense. A special committee on national defense of the American Railway Association, comprising the leading railroad executives of the United States, has been formed and its machinery has been in motion for a number of weeks. The executive committee of this special committee is composed of Fairfax Harrison, chairman; Howard Elliott, Hale Holden, Julius Kruttschnitt, Samuel Rea, and Daniel Willard, and Edgar E. Clark, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, ex-officio. This executive committee has established permanent headquarters in Washington with the necessary staff of experts and office employees at the expense of the railways of the United States, and is practically in continuous session. The special committee itself is subdivided over the country into six departments, each to correspond to one of the military departments of the Army. The personnel of these departmental bodies is made up in each case of from four to seven railroad executives. There are in turn subcommittees on car service, military equipment standards, military transportation accounting, military passenger tariffs, military freight tariffs, and materials and supplies, each of these committees being composed of highly qualified transportation executives. The special committee has adopted the broadest attitude in connection with the public interest. It has among other things declared that an emergency exists which requires that coal be given preference in car supply and movement; it has issued necessary instructions to the railways that the movement of ore be preferential, second only to coal; it has caused to be modified the car-service rules to facilitate the free movement of freight so as to permit a larger latitude in the handling of box cars in the interest of national efficiency as distinguished from that of individual railroads; and the specal committee has certified to the Council of National Defense that in its judgment certain preferences should be given to the movement of fuel, as follows:

First. Fuel for the United States Government.

Second. Fuel for the roads upon which mines are located.

Third. Fuel for steam railroads other than those upon which mines are located.

Fourth. Fuel for other purposes.

At Mr. Willard's request the committee submitted suggestions to the Council of National Defense as to persons to compose the proposed railroad commission to visit Russia and recommend methods for the operation of the Siberian railroads. The advisory commission of the Council of National Defense was advised that it was the sense of the special committee that conventions bringing large bodies of persons to one point should be discouraged in the interest of conservation of fuel, to avoid congestion, to prevent interruption to necessary freight traffic, and to conserve equipment and energies which must be applied to the accomplishment of transportation requirements of the country. The special committee has arranged for active study on the part of the department committees of—

(a) Distribution of power as between railroads.

(b) Adjustment of passenger-train service in accordance with national requirements.

Other accomplishments of the special defense committee are as follows:

The issuance to the railways of a bulletin indicating ways in which added efficiency might be obtained by individual roads; the initiation of a movement for the pooling of coal of like characteristics at lake ports in the interest of efficiency and expedition of movement; the undertakng of the enlistment of the nine reserve engineer regiments composed of skilled railway workers to aid in the rehabilitation of the railways of France, as well as in the operation of the French railways behind the English lines; an arrangement for the movement of coal for naval use from mines in West Virginia to the Pacific coast in box cars instead of in open cars, in order to prevent the uneconomical empty haul of open cars from Pacific coast points to the East; the handling of a vast number of requests for priority in car supply and in movement, these questions having been brought to the attention of the special committee by agencies of the Government, Members of Congress, and commercial interests; the preliminary work on relocation of cars so as to produce the largest measure of transportation; the perfection in connection with the proper officers of the Army of a complete scheme of cooperation in the movement of troops and supplies of every description. The definite practical expedition of movement of food products following on many conferences with representatives of the allies and of the Department of Agriculture. The special committee has also under way, among other things—

(a) Through negotiations with the National Industrial Traffic League, a representative body of shippers, the formation of a committee of shippers to cooperate with the special committee.

(b) The simplification of tariffs covering the movement of impediments for troops.

(c) The list of available routes between specified points for the use of military authorities.

Under the committee on national defense of the American Electric Railway Association, acting in cooperation with and at the instance of Mr. Willard, a committee, under the chairmanship of Gen. George H. Harries, has been organized and is cooperating with the special defense committee of the American Railway Association.

Mr. Willard has assisted in the creation of a committee of which Mr. John Stephens, one time chief engineer of the Panama Canal, is chairman and four other men prominent in railroad work are members, which has gone to Russia, properly accredited by the President to call on Russian officials. They will be met at Vladivostok and go over the road to find out what particular things are needed in the way of equipment that we can furnish, and what materials or men we can send that will be helpful.

Telephone and telegraph committee.

With regard to the utilization of the telephone and telegraph systems of the country for the Government's needs, the vital thing fully realized by both Federal officers and the wire companies has been to perfect a coordination to insure complete cooperation not only between the Government and the companies but between the companies themselves with regard to communications and censorship of communications. That was all arranged for some two months ago at the instance of Mr. Willard, chiefly through the instrumentality of Theodore N. Vail, president of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., who acts as chairman of this committee. Elaborate plans have been worked out already throughout the United States, all Government toll calls having been given precedence over official messages. The giving of this special service requires extraordinary action on the part of the telephone officials everywhere, including the special drilling of some 12,000 long-line operators in different parts of the country. The long-distance facilities out of Washington have been increased from 148 wires to 294 wires, and plans are now being made for a still further increase. Good telephone service can be given between Washington and the headquarters of every department and naval district in the United States. Provision has been made for handling telephone calls promptly even with a large increase in business between the various Army department headquarters and the State capitals, the Army posts, and the national and State mobilization camps in each military department. Extensive methods have been devised for special telephone and telegraph wire systems for the exclusive use of the War, Navy, and other departments of the Government. More than 10,000 miles of special systems have already been taken from commercial use and devoted exclusively to the service of the Navy, Agriculture, and other executive departments. A very comprehensive system for the War Department has been evolved and will be put into service upon the call of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army. Plans are being rapidly executed to increase the local telephone facilities of Washington; an entirely new central office with an ultimate capacity of 10,000 lines is being installed. Provision has already been made for the construction of telephone systems in the mobilization camps. Active assistance has been given by the Bell System to the United States Coast Guard officials and plans made for providing telephone connections at approximately 100 lighthouses and 200 Coast Guard stations, involving the laying of some 300 miles of submarine cable, constructing more than 650 miles of pole line, and stringing more than 1,200 miles of wire. Special facilities have been provided for the National Guard, particularly in connection with guarding important railroad points, bridges, and water-supply systems. Even more extensive plans have been put into effect in cooperation with the Navy with brilliant success.

Committee on supplies.

The function of the committee on supplies, of which the chairman is Julius Rosenwald, president of Sears, Roebuck & Co., of Chicago, is to cooperate with the purchasing bureaus of the War and Navy Departments, to advise and assist them in the procurement of necessary clothing, equipage, and food, and, as far as possible, to coordinate the buying of the respective departments in these directions. The committee is composed of six men chosen from different lines of business, who are devoting their entire time to the work of the committee without compensation. Associated with them are two officers of the Army, familiar with purchasing problems. The work of the committee on supplies may perhaps best be instanced by relating its action in an advisory capacity in connection with the method employed by the War and Navy Departments in purchasing supplies through advertising and circulars to bidders. The committee on supplies advanced that this method, while perhaps satisfactory in peace times, embodied very serious disadvantages in time of war in view of the multiplied need of the Government. Hence the committee advised the purchasing departments of the Government that the system of advertisement and bids would necessarily tend to a stimulation of the market with a resultant inflation of prices. On April 12, 1917, the Secretary of War declared that an emergency existed within the meaning of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, and ordered that contracts be made without advertising for bids. The committee has likewise endeavored, with some success, through the general munitions board, to coordinate the requirements and purchases of the various departments so as to reduce to a minimum or to eliminate altogether the possibility of the Government being a direct competitor of itself by the purchase of supplies through separate channels. Specifications of many of the items required by the Government were written at a time when needs were small and conditions of world trade normal. Radical changes have become necessary since this country entered the war in the specifications for textiles, shoes, and other items. A limited supply of raw materials and the needs of our allies have made immediate action imperative. Therefore the committee has cooperated with the proper departments in drafting new specifications which would provide the best possible substitutes for articles difficult or impossible to obtain in the requisite quantities.

The committee on supplies has wherever possible assisted the purchasing officers to deal directly with the prime producers of the articles needed. In the judgment of the committee a purchaser of the size of the United States needs the services of no middlemen to secure its supplies. In this scope of its work the committee has been subjected to criticism by dealers and Army contractors who have in the past secured options on supplies which they knew the Government would need and which they have then offered to the Government at an increased price.

In many instances the committee on supplies has been able to "peg" the price of supplies required in large quantities by the Government at figures existing at the beginning of the war, or in some cases at figures lower than those prevailing at that time. The committee has also secured options for the Government on large supplies of leather and other materials required at prices in effect at the beginning of the war, available for the Government's acceptance at periods of from four to six months.

The committee on supplies has caused to be created to advise and assist it cooperative committees in the cotton, woolen, shoe and leather, knit goods, and mattress industries. With the assistance of these committees the committee on supplies has been able to mobilize those industries for the service of the Government, to bring to the purchasing departments of the Government the services of many mills and factories which had never before produced Government goods and which would not now be in the market for the Government goods were they not asked by this committee for patriotic reasons to place a portion of their plants at the disposal of the Government. In this way the committee has been able to enlarge the field in which the purchasing departments of the Government are able to buy and also to increase the deliveries.

The committee on supplies has had field agents cooperating with the factories to expedite deliveries of Government goods. These field agents have served without expense to the Government for time or disbursements. Through the securing of options, through the "pegging" of prices of the various articles, through the elimination of middlemen, through the reduction in competition between Government departments in buying, the committee believes it has enabled the Government to make substantial savings in its purchases. The committee has worked primarily on articles of merchandise which involved unusual difficulty, either because of the large quantities in which they were required or because of the shortage of the materials involved in their manufacture or because of the unusual competitive demand for similar articles for civilian use. Members of the committee have conferred with members of the Balfour mission as to the methods of purchasing which have been developed by the Governments of our allies.

Raw materials, minerals, and metals.

This committee, headed by Bernard M. Baruch, has organized the field with regard to raw materials, minerals, and metals in the following industries: Alcohol, aluminum, asbestos, magnesia and roofing, brass, cement, chemicals, coal-tar by-products, copper, lead, lumber, mica, nickel, oil, pig iron, iron ore and Lake transportation, rubber, steel and steel products, sulphur, wool, and zinc.

Cooperative committees have been formed under the foregoing headings. Several of these committees maintain representatives in Washington in order to keep in close touch with the executive departments of the Government, and the chairmen of all of the cooperative committees visit Washington from time to time and get in touch with the departments with which they have to deal. Their endeavor is to become acquainted with the requirements of the Government departments and their specifications and in every way possible be helpful. While those committees were formed to mobilize the industries in given fields and to act only in an advisory capacity, experience has shown that they have been of great immediate value to the Government in perfecting early deliveries and in the making of lower-than-market prices.

The concrete accomplishments of the committee on raw materials, minerals, and metals may be itemized as follows:

(a) Forty-five million pounds of copper have been offered to the Government by the copper interests, acting at the instance of this committee, at an approximate saving to the Government of $10,000,000. It is the belief of this committee that through this agency hundreds of millions of pounds of copper required by the allies and our own departments, such as the Army, Navy, and the Panama Canal Commission, can be bought at prices that will show an enormous saving.

(b) The cooperative committee on zinc has already contracted for some 25,000,000 pounds of zinc at practically two-thirds of the market price and is prepared to use its efforts to effect still further savings on the vast quantities that must be purchased.

(c) Through the cooperative committee on steel the Navy Department contracted for several hundred thousand tons of ship plates and other materials at great concessions. When ship places were selling at $160 a ton the Navy bought them at $58 a ton.

(d) The cooperative committee on aluminum purchased for the Government its need of aluminum at 27½ cents per pound, when the regular price of the sellers to large purchasers was 38 cents and the market price was 60 cents per pound.

(e) The cooperative committee on chemicals is now engaged in negotiations with the fertilizer interests of the country, which will stabilize and lower prices.

(f) The cooperative committee on oil has closed contracts for the delivery of oil to the Navy of a highly satisfactory nature with regard to prices and deliveries.

It should be stated that none of the foregoing committees is in any way exercising executive functions, but each has merely advised with and assisted the executive department of the Government in the purchase of their supplies.

Committee on labor.

This committee has as its chairman Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor. For the purpose of mobilizing the labor elements of the country for the Government's assistance in the furtherance of the war Mr. Gompers called a meeting for organization purposes in Washington on April 2, 1917. More than 150 labor representatives and employers were present, as well as the officers and executive committee of the American Federation of Labor, the presidents or representatives of the leading international unions and of the railway brotherhoods, and of the National Association of Manufacturers, and representatives of a wide range of commercial, transportation, financial, and civic interests. It was the definite purpose of Mr. Gompers and his associates to avoid the unfortunate industrial experiences of England in the opening months of the European war. Out of the conference in question it became clear that on the issue of national defense a remarkable unity of purpose had developed among the many diverse groups represented, which it would be possible to utilize to practical ends through the committee on labor of the Advisory Commission. A permanent organization was formed and an executive committee of 11 members named. Growing from this eight national committees have been appointed, of which those whose plans are furthest advanced are the committees in relation to wages and hours, mediation and conciliation, and welfare work, including safety, sanitation, and industrial training. The principle upon which these features of the welfare work committee's assigned task is based is that the health, welfare, and efficiency of the workers in the vital industries, upon which all else depends, are ultimate resources, which must be conserved in the interest of the national defense. To the committee on labor have been pledged the support and cooperation of such national and local organizations, both of labor and of industry, and in various civic and technical fields, as the American Federation of Labor, the National Association of Manufacturers, the American Institute of Architects, the National Fire Prevention Association, the National Board of Fire Underwriters, the Illuminating Engineers Society, the National Council of Safety, the American Museum of Safety, the National Consumers' League, the National Child Labor Committee, the American Association of Industrial Physicians and Surgeons, the American Public Health Association, the Young Men's Christian Association, the National Civic Federation, the National Association for the Promotion of Industrial Education, the Joint Conference of Coal Miners and Operators of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Western Pennsylvania, and the Mining and Metallurgical Society of America.

Conferences with British and Canadian labor.

In response to the cabled request of Mr. Gompers to Premier Lloyd-George, of Great Britain, there is now in this country a commission of four representatives of English labor and welfare work, which has placed at the disposal of the Committee on Labor the English experience throughout the past three years in dealing with employment problems of the utmost gravity. This commission consists of C. W. Bowerman and James H. Thomas, members of Parliament, and, respectively, secretary of the British Trade Union Congress and secretary of the National Union of Railway Men; H. W. Garrod, representing labor in the department of ministry of munitions; and Joseph Davies, secretary to Mr. David Lloyd-George. The members of the British labor commission have been in executive session with members of the Committee on Labor during the greater part of the past two weeks, and have since been joined by two labor representatives sent by the Government of Canada. Both the English and the Canadian commissions were heard at length at a public session of the full Committee on Labor on May 15, 1917. The discussions proved of high practical value, and were participated in by Judge Maurice S. Amos, of the British commission; James Duncan, representing labor on the American commission to Russia; John D. Rockefeller, jr.; Daniel Guggenheim; John R. Alpino, president of the Plumbers & Steamfitters' Association; Emerson McMillin; Arthur O. Wharton, president of the railway employees' department of the American Federation of Labor; Theodore Marburg; George W. Perkins; Colgate Hoyt; Sara B. Conboy, secretary of the United Textile Workers; and former Ambassador Myron T. Herrick, and others. The committee and its guests were received at the White House by President Wilson, who expressed his personal interest in the work of the committee and his desire to cooperate in the furtherance of its purpose. The committee on labor has now a membership of some 400 persons. Its executive committee consists of—

Samuel Gompers, chairman.
Hon. William B. Wilson, Secretary of Labor.
V. Everit Macy, president National Civil Federation.
James Lord, president mining department, American Federation of Labor.
Elisha Lee, general manager Pennsylvania Railroad.
Warren S. Stone, grand chief Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.
C. E. Michael, of the National Association of Manufacturers.
Frank Morrison, secretary American Federation of Labor.
Lee K. Frankel, third vice president Metropolitan Insurance Co.
James O'Connell, president metal trades department, American Federation of Labor.
Louis B. Schram, chairman labor committees, United States Brewers' Association.

To maintain existing standards.

Perhaps the most outstanding achievement of the committee on labor has been the following resolution, adopted at the meeting of its executive committee and approved by the Council of National Defense and its advisory commission on April 6, 1917:

The defense and safety of the Nation must be the first consideration of all patriotic citizens. To avoid confusion and facilitate the preparation for national defense and give a stable basis upon which the representatives of the Government may operate during the war, we recommend:

First. That the Council of National Defense should issue a statement to employers and employees in our industrial plants and transportation systems advising that neither employers nor employees shall endeavor to take advantage of the country's necessities to change existing standards. When economic or other emergencies arise requiring changes of standards, the same should be made only after such proposed changes have been investigated and approved by the Council of National Defense.

Second. That the Council of National Defense urge upon the legislatures of the States, as well as all administrative agencies charged with the enforcement of labor and health laws, the great duty of rigorously maintaining the existing safeguards as to the health and the welfare of workers, and that no departure from such present standards in State laws or State rulings affecting labor should be taken without a declaration of the Council of National Defense that such a departure is essential for the effective pursuit of the national defense.

Third. That the Council of National Defense urge upon the legislatures of the several States that before final adjournment they delegate to the governors of their respective States the power to suspend or modify restrictions contained in their labor laws when such suspension or modification shall be requested by the Council of National Defense; and such suspensions or modifications, when made, shall continue for a specified period and not longer than the duration of the war.

The foregoing resolution was on April 16, by motion of the executive committee of the committee on labor and with the approval of the Council of National Defense, amplified as follows:

There seems to be some misunderstanding of the scope of the statement made by the Council of National Defense when it advised "that neither employers nor employees shall endeavor to take advantage of the country's necessities to change existing standards." In order that that misundersanding may be removed, the following amplification is made:

There have been established by legislation, by mutual agreement between employers and employees, or by custom certain standards constituting a day's work. These vary from 7 hours per day in some kinds of work to 12 hours per day in continuous-operation plants. The various States and municipalities have established specific standards of safety and sanitation and have provided inspection service to enforce the regulations. They have also established maximum hours of work for women and minimum age limits for children employed in gainful occupations. It is the judgment of the Council of National Defense that the Federal, State, and municipal governments should continue to enforce the standards they have established unless and until the Council of National Defense has determined that some modifications or change of standards is essential to the national safety; that employers and employees in private industries should not attempt to take advantage of the existing abnormal conditions to change the standards which they were unable to change under normal conditions.

The one other standard that the council had in mind was the standard of living. It recognizes that the standard of living is indefinite and difficult to determine, because it is in a measure dependent upon the purchasing power of wages. It believes, however, that no arbitrary change in wages should be sought at this time by either employers or employees through the process of strikes or lockouts without at least giving the established agencies, including those of the several States and of the Government, and of the Mediation Board in the transportation service and the Division of Conciliation of the Department of Labor in other industries, an opportunity to adjust the difficulties without a stoppage of work occurring. While the Council of National Defense does not mean to intimate that under ordinary circumstances the efficiency of workers is the only element that should be taken into consideration in fixing the hours of labor, safety, sanitation, women's work, and child-labor standards, such efficiency is the object that must be attained during the period when the Nation's safety is involved. It may therefore be necessary for the council, as a result of its investigations and experiences, to suggest modifications and changes in these standards during that time. It is not the purpose of the council, however, to undertake to determine the wage rate that will be sufficient to maintain the existing standards of living. Such questions as can not be adjusted by private negotiations should be referred to the mediation agencies above referred to or to such other constituted agencies as may exist to the end that such questions may be adjusted in an orderly and equitable manner to avoid the stoppage of industries which are so vital to the interests of the Nation at this critical time.

Munitions and manufacturing (including standardization), and industrial relations.

The Council of National Defense has in its files more than 27,000 detailed reports from the larger manufacturing plants of the country as to capacity of those plants to meet the military and industrial needs of the Government in time of war. This vast fund of information was collected by the committee on industrial preparedness of the Naval Consulting Board of the United States, said committee being headed by Mr. Coffin, and all of the records are now under Mr. Coffin's branch of the work in the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense.

Under Mr. Coffin are concentrated the activities of a body known as the committee on automotive transport, which has to do with truck specifications for the War Department, the training of truck masters and chauffeurs, military truck tires, motorization of field artillery, volunteer motor-truck companies, matters of personnel, matters dealing with engine and transmission manufacturers and with drop forge managers, and the necessities of tractor manufacture in connection with the food problem.

The specifications for military trucks, under which bids to be opened on June 10, 1917, in Chicago, have been asked for, will be distributed in printed form within a few days. Their issuance makes the final step in the result of a long-continued cooperation between the motor transport board of the War Department and the Society of Automotive Engineers, represented in the committee on automotive transport in an endeavor to arrive at a set of specifications having a maximum value to the Army, and yet to be drawn in such shape as to meet commercial needs and encourage manufacturers in the greatest possible degree.

On May 14, 1917, a conference of 15 chief engineers, representing the principal truck manufacturers of the United States and held in the rooms of the committee under the auspices of the Society of Automotive Engineers, resulted in a complete standardization of many of the salient details as to special equipment demanded by the Quartermaster's Department on trucks for war service. Great uniformity was obtained, even in those details not completely standardized. This marks the entering wedge of a completely standardized military truck. A still more important and possibly far-reaching effect of the meeting was the agreement arrived at to cooperate in the purchase of the particular parts under consideration. The cost, for instance, of designing and duplicating the die and tool equipment for making each new type of towing hook or guard may exceed a thousand dollars, although the number of pieces needed for any one manufacturer is relatively small. It is hoped to save all of this overhead by concentrating upon one type which will be satisfactory to all the engineers concerned and which can be produced economically in quantities sufficient for all the Army needs by a relatively small number of sources of supply. In the aggregate this constitutes a large saving to the Government and makes it possible for the engineers to focus their labors on the production of essential developments. The Office of the Quartermaster General has expressed approval of, and is cooperating in, a plan put forward by the committee to furnish truck masters and chauffeurs in sufficient numbers. This work embraces the coordination of schools and private concerns so far as possible in the direction of stimulating enlistment in the Reserve Corps and in giving proper instructions to round off the preparation of thousands of passenger-car drivers into truck drivers.

This committee had arranged through the Office of the Quartermaster General for prompt delivery of the steel necessary in the equipment of demountable tires, many technical complications having been cleared away. The committee is prepared to offer to the Government through the channel of the Society of Automotive Engineers alone some 1,000 engineers of the highest type, capable of adaption to practically all of the mechanical transport needs of the Government, from the laying out of designs to the officering and maintenance of motor transport units. The committee is also taking up actively the question of farm tractors in connection with the food problem, being in close touch with the qualified persons on this subject now in the United States with the British commission, and has been as well in conference with the authorities of the Department of Agriculture.

A cooperative committee has been appointed by the Association of Public Utilities Companies to represent said companies in an advisory capacity to Mr. Coffin. This cooperative committee has to do with large problems pertaining to the production and distribution of power and light (both gas and electrical).

Under Mr. Coffin also is serving in an advisory capacity a committee of five appointed by the National Industrial Conference Board, representing the greater percentage of the manufacturing and producing concerns in the country.

Under the committee on engineering and education, the chairman of which is Dr. Hollis Godfrey, the chief consideration has been the development of a comprehensive method for the solution of problems of engineering and education in the United States, brought sharply to the fore under war-time conditions. Working under this committee are consulting, operating, general engineering, production engineering, and education sections, of which the last is divided into a university group and a secondary school group. The consulting section touches general engineering as they relate to manufacture and construction; the operating section is concerned with the consummation of policies outlined by the consulting section, and the checking of these policies in actual practice; the general engineering section deals with the development of engineering as related to war; the production engineering section handles specific problems of production engineering as they relate to certain groups of fundamental industries; and the education section is active in the coordination of the educational resources of the country and their relation to the National Government. The committee has covered a great deal of broad ground which may not be stated in detail here.

The settlement of the railroad strike.

Because of the necessity of maintaining uninterrupted transportation facilities during the war the Council of National Defense and its advisory commission took an active interest in the settlement of the recent threatened national railroad strike. Following upon a special meeting of the Council of National Defense to consider this emergent situation, the council recommended to the President of the United States and his Cabinet that two of the members of the council, namely, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Labor, and two of the members of the advisory commission, Daniel Willard and Samuel Gompers, proceed at once to New York and enter into negotiations with the railroads and employees looking to a successful adjustment of the issue. This was done, and the outcome of these negotiations is too well known to demand specific statement here.

The volunteer nonpaid servants of the Council of National Defense and the advisory commission.

The work of the Council of National Defense is largely carried on through the assistance of civilians who serve without pay. Their services have been obtained in the full realization that the conduct of modern war enlists the nonpartisan specialists of every industry and every science, and in the realization that wars are now won not only by fighting men but also by coordinated industries.

In the service of the council and advisory commission, with the labors of both bodies touching about every angle of the Nation's life, there are but 80 paid employees. Almost all of these are clerks and stenographers. A task similar to that with which the Congress has charged the council and advisory commission can be carried on with so small a salary roll only by the volunteer service of civilians above referred to. Of these there are more than 100 men of the most highly trained type, drawn from the fields of every industry and science the expert knowledge from which it is absolutely vital to obtain and utilize in the present national emergency. These 100 men are giving their entire time to the council and commission without compensation. They themselves pay their living expenses in Washington. In addition there are several hundred more men of the same type giving free a large part of their time to the work, not only in Washington but throughout the country. It can not be made too clear that the council and advisory commission are enabled to carry on their labors at so low a cost only through the ungrudging aid of these volunteer, nonpaid workers, representative in very great measure of the trained brain power of the Nation.

Attached hereto you will find detailed lists of the personnel of the council and advisory commission and of their boards, sections, and committees.

Very respectfully,

W. S. GIFFORD,
Director of the Council of National Defense and of the Advisory Commission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before yielding the floor, I simply desire to say that I know very little about this matter; I do not pretend to know any more about it than does any other Senator; but I have a feeling that it would be wise for us to inform ourselves pretty thoroughly before we proceed to criticize too severely these very eminent gentlemen who have come here voluntarily and devoted their time and attention to the needs of the Government in the time of the Government's emergency.

I am not sure but what Mr. Rosenwald is correct when he says that if the amendment which the committee put into this bill is adopted it would necessarily abolish this advisory commission, after the enormous work that they have done in coordinating the various industries of the country. I am not sure that it would, either, but I can see this, I think, pretty plainly: These men are all experts, and have been put on this commission because they were experts in their various lines of business. Most of them are very wealthy men, of course, having come from the heads of great corporations. Most of them are stockholders, not only in their own concerns, but in many of the related concerns. If it must be so that no member of this commission at the head of a great coordinated industry reaching all over the country may have anything to do with the Government in the way of directing or advising it to make any contract with any company in which he is in any way interested, either directly or indirectly, or in which he owns any stock, I can readily see that for a man in that position, with this sort of a law in existence, he is put in a position where he has to boycott his own companies, although his honest judgment may be that the Government can get the best material and the cheapest price from a company in which he may own some stock. Take the Steel Trust, for instance. The Government wants steel; it may have a steel expert on the advisory commission; he may be a very wealthy man; he may own stock in some steel company that is subsidiary to the Steel Corporation, and yet if this amendment is adopted, if he stays on the advisory commission, no corporation and no company of the Steel Trust can sell a dollar's worth of product to the Government, or at least this expert can not have anything to do with advising them to do so, or in procuring the contract.

Of course if it is so, that it is better to disband this commission, to throw away the work which they have done, and to proceed de novo to select for a new governmental board men who have no interest in any product that the Government is to purchase during this war, if such men can be found, why, well and good; but I do not think that we ought to proceed so rapidly in the assumption that that must be done. I feel that the various amendments suggested by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], the theories advanced by the Senator from Missouri, and the principle ordinarily concurred in, that a man can not properly buy from or sell to himself or intermingle his private relations with the capacity and duties of a trustee are along the right line, still we are operating now under very exceptional circumstances. I do feel, in view of what has been said so far, that it would be the part of wisdom if the Senate would defer the consideration of trying to reorganize the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense until after the food-control bill has departed from the Senate. I think there is too much at stake to rush wildly into trying to reform the whole thing, if it needs reform, by an amendment to the pending food-control bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, yesterday at the time of the adjournment I said that if we were unable to-day to reach a unanimous-consent agreement as to the time we should vote on this bill, I would present a motion to close debate under the rule adopted by the Senate at its special session in March. Since that time I have conferred with a number of Senators, and I believe that there will be a chance to agree upon a time to vote when we convene day after to-morrow. Therefore I will not present the motion this afternoon, but I will state, Mr. President, that when the Senate convenes on Thursday I will ask again for a unanimous-consent agreement to fix the time for a vote on the bill, and then, if objection is made to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, I shall at once present a motion to limit debate. I wanted Senators to know my purpose, so that they would be prepared to act accordingly.

Mr. President, I hope and believe that all of us realize the importance of this measure, and that Senators want, if possible, to reach an agreement to fix a time when we shall vote. I shall therefore make the motions in the order which I suggest when the Senate convenes on Thursday.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an important letter from Judge S. Taliaferro, of Houston, Tex., on the subject of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

HOUSTON, TEX., June 27, 1917.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have just read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 19 the very able analysis made by you on the floor of the Senate of Senate bill No. 2463, and your argument in behalf of the measure is very convincing; but it seems to me that if the bill were amended in certain particulars it would bring about more easily the desired results, which I understand to be—

First. The conservation of the products raised in the United States for food, clothing purposes, etc., to the end not only that our people shall not suffer want but that our armies and the armies and peoples of our allies in this war may not suffer for want of food, etc.

Second. To vest in the President "power to take action, if necessary to increase the production of this country, so as to meet the demands which necessarily will be made upon us for supplies."

Not long ago I read in a magazine an article which estimated that this country will have to produce 150 per cent more food products than it has ever raised in order to supply our own people, our armies, and the people and armies of our allies. If this estimate be true, and it seems to me reasonable, the farmers and stock raisers of this country will have to increase their holdings and cultivation of lands 150 per cent in order to meet this desired increase in production.

Now, Senator, how can the farmers and stock raisers of this country be expected to make this increase? To do so they will have to purchase or open up other lands to cultivation. They will have to correspondingly increase the teams, the farm implements, and they will have to double the force of labor now employed on the farms and make financial arrangements for supplies during the making of the crops.

We must look the situation in the face as it is. Take Texas with her 400,000 farmers; about 200,000 of these are tenant farmers. Will it be possible for them to obtain the money to double their acreage? Take the landlord farmer and the large planter; from what source could they obtain the money to increase their acreage and crop production? We all know that it is difficult for any class of farmers, even the wealthiest, to obtain money for any other purpose than that of carrying him through the crop season, even at the high rates of interest, because the money lender and the credit furnisher take into consideration the liability of crop failure.

"Ceres may plant and Apollo water, but God alone—i. e., the seasons—giveth the increase."

You and I have known of a failure of crops two years out of three in Texas, and the same experience has been had in every portion of this country.

I notice that the bill gives the President the power to fix prices for a three-year period. This period, in my judgment, is too short to admit of the farmer being able to obtain the money necessary to increase his production to the point desired by the Government. Take the tenant farmer, the small-farm owner, or the large planter, if he has to double his production he would not be able to borrow the money for the purpose on three years' credit, or to repay even if he had good crops. If he should suffer failure of crops one year or two years during the three-year period, he would be bankrupt for years to come.

Now, I suggest for your consideration this idea: To fix a price on all products of the farm, ranch, and truck garden which the Government may need, and wool and hides, for a period of five years, the price fixed to be sufficiently high to encourage the farmers to increase their production with the knowledge that the Government will guarantee them a minimum price which will pay the cost of his production with a small profit in addition. Suppose that the Government said to the cotton farmer: We need twice the amount of cotton we are now raising. If you cotton farmers will increase your cultivation, the Government will guarantee you 15 cents per pound for your cotton for a period of five years from January 1, 1918; and to the wheat farmer the Government guarantees $1.25 per bushel for wheat for the same term; to the corn farmer 80 cents for five years; and so on, covering all the products which may be needed.

I believe that if such a guaranty of the Government is given for five years that the farmers of every class will be encouraged to increase their production, and it will stimulate the money and credit men to furnish to the farmer the funds necessary to make this increase. These guaranties should be for a period of five years, whether peace is declared or not, because, naturally, when peace is declared the high price which these products are now bringing will naturally and necessarily decline, and the farmer can not afford to take the risk of having the benefit of the prices fixed by the President, by authority of this bill, cut off within one year after the war ceases. The war may cease within six months or a year; and if the farmer has borrowed money and made preparation for this increase he would very probably be left bankrupt for the balance of his career.

Another point I desire to urge is that hundreds of millions of dollars can be saved to the Government if the Government will constitute the nearest port to the producer a concentration point for the products it will need, and require the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the same rate per mile for railway carriage to all of the ports of the country. This will be of immense advantage both to the Government and to the farmer, because—

First, the concentration of all supplies needed by the Government at ports will give the Government the opportunity to inspect, classify, and select such products as it may need, and to do this cheaply.

During the Spanish War the Government purchased everything it needed through contracts, and had an army of inspectors of every kind and description traveling over the country to inspect articles it needed, and many millions of dollars were paid out by the Government for the salaries and expense accounts of these employees. That the result was disastrous we all know. "The embalmed-beef" episode has not yet been forgotten by the people. Millions of dollars were spent for rotten hay, diseased and unfit horses and mules, canned goods that poisoned our troops, and, in fact, the Treasury was raided in every way. I believe that by constituting the ports of the country concentration points these incidents will not occur again, but if the same plan is pursued we may expect the same results, and this administration will be as sharply criticized by the people and press of the country as was McKinley's administration.

Second, the suggested concentration of all products at the nearest port to the point of production will create competitive markets for the products, and the farmers, stock raisers, etc., will get the benefit of whatever price is paid without contribution to the middleman.

Third, this concentration at the ports will enable the Government to move its purchases by either rail or water. If the necessity arises to return a part of it to the interior, it will have the railway systems of the country to move it; if it is desired at coastwise or foreign points, the production will be at the ship's side, ready at all times for shipment.

As you are aware the organized farmers, cattlemen, sheepmen, woolmen, and all the agricultural interests have for many years been recommending interior warehouses, controlled by these organizations, with clearing-house warehouses at the ports, and the principal reason why these clearing-house warehouses have not been established at the South Atlantic ports and Gulf ports is because the great transcontinental lines have maintained a freight rate by which the farm products could be carried to the North Atlantic ports at a less freight rate than the same product could be delivered at the South Atlantic and Gulf ports.

To illustrate what I mean:

If to-day you were to start two carloads of wheat from Bismarck, N. Dak., one to New York, a distance of 1,763 miles, and the other carload to Port Houston, a distance of 1,640 miles, the carload to Houston would pay 59 cents per 100 pounds, while the carload to New York, although transported 123 miles farther, would only pay a rate of 42.8 cents per mile. In other words, the Dakota farmer, by reason of the high freight rates charged from Bismarck to the port of Houston, is prevented from shipping his grain to Port Houston by the difference in railroad rates charged by the north and south lines. The carload to New York would pay the railroad $308.16, while the carload to Port Houston would pay the railroad $424.80. This is unfortunate for the grain farmers of the Dakotas, Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma, and, in fact, to all the producers occupying the territory east of the Rocky Mountains and west of the Mississippi River, for all of which territory the port of Houston is the nearest port. If the same rate per mile was charged from Bismarck to Port Houston that is charged from Bismarck to New York, the Dakota farmer would save between 9 and 10 cents on every bushel of grain for foreign shipment. The same proposition is true as to all the farm products in the territory above named.

Now, Senator, I hold that Port Houston and the other Gulf ports, as well as the South Atlantic ports, should enjoy a freight rate which will enable these ports to handle the products raised in the territory most nearly adjacent to it; and if each of the Pacific ports, the Gulf ports, and the South Atlantic ports, and perhaps one or two of the ports on the Great Lakes, could have the same freight rate per mile that the North Atlantic ports enjoy, it would increase the price to the farmer of all the products that he raises, and in my judgment would encourage him to increase his product as desired by the Government.

The establishment of all these ports as concentration points would bring together at the points of concentration the buyers of the world, establish competition, and guarantee to the farmer the highest price for his products. These advantages the farmer will never enjoy until the freight-rate situation is adjusted so that the product can reach the nearest port at the same rate per mile as it is carried to North Atlantic ports.

For many years I have been on the deep-water committee of Houston, and since the completion of the channel to a depth and width which admits of its easy use by all ships drawing 25½ feet of water, I have been preaching Houston as the natural concentration and distribution port for the territory indicated, and if Congress can have the railway freight situation adjusted so that the Dakota farmer can ship his grain to Port Houston at the same rate per mile that he pays to New York, the wheat of the Dakotas and of the entire territory above indicated will be brought to Port Houston and other Gulf ports for distribution to the markets of the world. The same difference in freight rates which applies to wheat applies to all the farm products of the country, and to benefit the farmer, as well as assist the Government in controlling the food products of the country, I hold that this change should be put in force at once.

I feel satisfied that if the ports indicated are made concentration points for farm products and the railroad rates are adjusted as suggested that the Government will be able to control the entire surplus of foodstuffs of this country, at a saving of many hundred millions of dollars.

I have had some correspondence with Hon. David F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, with regard to the establishment of warehouses and other facilities on the Houston Ship Channel for the purpose of concentrating at Port Houston the products of the ranch, farm, and garden, which will be needed by the Government for its own use, as well as for our allies in this war; and I suggested to him that if his department or any other department could advance, say, two and a half million dollars, to be repaid to the Government with 5 per cent interest and secured by a lien on the land and the properties, that I and my associates will form a company, raise two and a half million dollars and with this money purchase the lands, at a valuation to be placed upon it by the land bank appraisers, and with the residue of the fund construct grain elevators, cotton warehouses, a meat-packing plant, drying barns for potatoes, canneries, a tannery, and such other plants as may be necessary to handle and prepare for market the different products which are raised in the territory tributary to the port of Houston.

I have also suggested that if this arrangement could be made with the Government that we would desire to have one or more representatives of the Government on the board of directors, so that the Government would be assured that the money loaned by it was properly applied. Also, I would want the Agricultural and the food departments to detail men who are experienced in the handling of products and in the construction of plants for their use and holding, so that the plants constructed would be the most economic and convenient for the respective purposes. Mr. Houston seems to think that additional legislation would be necessary in order to have his department or any other make a contract of this kind. If such a contract can be made and the Government advance, say, two and a half million dollars at 5 per cent per annum, payable in 10 years, secured by a first lien on the land and plants I feel confident that construction of the different plants can be begun within 60 days, which would enable us to handle a portion of the now growing crops. I would like to have your judgment on this. Further, I believe that if such a contract can be made that all other ports, except perhaps the North Atlantic ports, which have all necessary facilities, would be glad to make a similar contract with the Government. If this is done it opens up competitive markets to the farmers, reduces the freight rates, and will enable the Government to select what it needs at the different concentration points at small expense.

I shall be glad if you will give this matter your earliest consideration. I am aware that it is presented in a very clumsy way, but I think you will be able to discover the points I desire to make, which, to recapitulate, are:

First. A guarantee for farm and ranch products needed by the Government for a period of five years, at fixed prices sufficiently high to assure the farmer against loss and thus enable him to borrow the money necessary to increase his production.

Second. Adjust the freight rates so that all railways to the ports shall charge the same rate per mile without discrimination in favor of the North Atlantic ports.

Third. Arrange for money to be advanced by the Government at 5 per cent interest per annum for a period, say, of 10 years, to be well secured, provided the parties interested in the respective ports furnish the same amount of money as advanced by the Government, said sums to be expended in the purchase of proper sites and the construction of such plants as will assist the Government in procuring, storing, handling, and shipping of the different products which it will need.

Fourth. Provide for the contract that I suggest I and my associates will be glad to make with the Government.

These suggestions, of course, apply to every portion of the United States producing products which the Government will need, and I believe if they can be carried out by appropriate legislation it will mean a saving to the Government of many millions of dollars and will prove of unquestioned benefit to the great agricultural classes of the United States.

Houston having been selected as the place for one of the training camps to accommodate 25,000 troops, I am of the opinion that a concentration plant, such as I suggest, will prove a great economy to the Government.

Very truly, yours, S. TALIAFERRO.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

RECESS OVER FOURTH OF JULY.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until Thursday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m., Tuesday, July 3, 1917) the Senate took a recess until Thursday, July 5, 1917, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 3 (legislative day of June 28), 1917.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Capt. Henry B. Wilson to be a rear admiral in the Navy from the 1st day of July, 1917.

Commander William C. Brotherton to be a captain in the Navy from the 1st day of July, 1917.

Lieut. Commander Charles S. Freeman to be a commander in the Navy from the 26th day of June, 1917.

Lieut. Commander Robert L. Berry to be a commander in the Navy from the 1st day of July, 1917.

The following-named lieutenants to be lieutenant commanders in the Navy from the 23d day of May, 1917:

Russell Willson, and Leigh Noyes.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 3, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in Heaven, for the spirit of '76 which brought forth on this continent a new Nation, "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." Now we are engaged in a world-wide struggle testing whether that Nation or any nation so conceived and dedicated can long endure. Exercise, we beseech Thee, Thy holy influence to still internal strife and contentions within our borders and within the borders of all the entente nations; that all liberty-loving men may fix their minds upon the paramount issue, that the world may have a new birth of freedom, and that "government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth." And grant, O most merciful Father, that mankind may be lifted through the sacrifices which are being made and shall be made into the higher altitudes of religious thought and endeavor; that they may live together in brotherly love and learn war no more forever under the spiritual leadership of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 30, was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my friends save me the trouble of making a speech during this hot weather by letting me print some matters in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman want to extend his remarks in the RECORD on some legislation before the House?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir. It is some articles from my home newspapers that explain things better than I can do myself. One of the chief subjects is the improvement of the Chattahoochee River by private capital, and there is a little article or two about complying with the law and enforcing the law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short telegram from the chairman of the Woman's Party of Colorado on the subject of woman suffrage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the telegram referred to:

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., June 30, 1917.

HON. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the United States has entered world war to fight for democracy, national enfranchisement of half of the people is urgent political necessity. In name of true patriotism we demand enfranchisement of women by immediate passage of Susan B. Anthony amendment as war measure. Request also above be read into CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

BERTHA W. FOWLE,
State Chairman Protest Meeting Against Imprisonment Suffragist Pickets, Auspices Colorado National Woman's Party.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. HULBERT. On the subject of aeronautics.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the matter that was objected to the other day?

Mr. HULBERT. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. On what subject?

Mr. RAKER. On the question of picketing and woman suffrage.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. RAKER. A part of it will be. It is short.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article written by W. H. Fleming, a former Member of Congress, on the constitutionality of the conscription law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article written by Hon. W. H. Fleming, lately Member of the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article upon the constitutionality, and so forth, of the conscription law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article upon the constitutionality of the conscription law. Is there objection?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I object.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a very brief statement of the wealth, annual income, and so forth, of the seven different nations now engaged in war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I object.

SWEARING IN A MEMBER—RICHARD N. ELLIOTT.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present RICHARD N. ELLIOTT, Congressman elect from the sixth Indiana district, and ask that he be sworn in, his certificate having been filed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the certificate of election of the gentleman from Indiana, properly signed by the governor and countersigned by the secretary of state.

Mr. ELLIOTT appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by Prof. Johnson, of Harvard, on the subject of the preferential ballot.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, how long is the article, may I ask?

Mr. CROSSER. It is 15 or 20 pages, I think, part of it in pamphlet form.

Mr. LENROOT. I object.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the service of fraternal-insurance organizations during the war.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving to right to object, how lengthy is the article?

Mr. HAWLEY. About two sticks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold that just a moment?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. CRISP. I am willing to withhold it, but I understand that we have a unanimous-consent agreement that nothing will be done this week.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was going to ask the House to indulge me for 10 minutes on the subject of the food bill.

Mr. CRISP. I will withhold my motion for the gentleman from Ohio to submit his request to the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am obliged to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion to adjourn.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I asked a few moments ago for the insertion in the RECORD of a very brief statement of some interesting facts. They will not occupy more than one-fourth of one page. A gentleman on that side of the House informed me that he would not consent to any unanimous consent on this side of the House, but that he would have no objection to what his side desired. Now, if that is to be the rule——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I make my request, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what was the statement that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] made on Saturday last, that there would be no business transacted of any sort this week?

Mr. GARNER. This is not business.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This is not business, but this is keeping the people here.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MOON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of W. H. Travis (H. R. 3044), no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WINGO. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until Friday, July 6, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Delaware River from Trenton, N. J., to Easton, Pa. (H. Doc. No. 226); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Nelson N. Boydston v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 227); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Levi S. Warren v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 228); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of John C. Black v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 229); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of William J. Berry, son of Joseph G. Berry, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 230); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Thomas Derry v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 231); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Oak Park Trust & Savings Bank, executor of Elijah S. Watts, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 232); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Sarah J. Grayson, widow of James W. M. Grayson, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 233); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

9. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Neora Thompson, widow (remarried) of William R. Brazee, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 234); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

10. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Morgan L. Martin, Sarah G. Martin, and Deborah B. Martin, children of Morgan L. Martin, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 235); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

11. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Sarah A. Robertson, widow (remarried) of George W. Bolt, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 236); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

12. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Benjamin P. Blodgett and Fred S. Blodgett, executors of George Blodgett, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 237); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

13. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Ellen A. Beer, widow of Simon B. Beer, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 238); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

14. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Cullen E. Cline v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 239); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

15. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Erastus Guy v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 240); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

16. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of John Getchey v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 241); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

17. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Benjamin D. Gallino v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 242); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

18. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of William R. Carlton v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 243); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

19. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Clinton C. Brown v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 244); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

20. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Ralph H. Osborne v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 245); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

21. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Candelario Martinez v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 246); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

22. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of George F. Knowlton v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 247); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. OSBORNE: A bill (H. R. 5317) providing that the United States flag shall be displayed in all United States courts while in session; that the attention of foreign-born applicants for naturalization shall be directed to the national flag, and that they shall be instructed as to its meaning and their duties in relation thereto, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HULBERT: A bill (H. R. 5318) to commission acting assistant or contract surgeons of the United States Army who have served in the Army for a period of at least three months, to be first lieutenants in the United States Medical Reserve Corps, and to add to the Medical Corps of the Army in case of necessity; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 5324) giving applicants under the stock-raising homestead law, whose applications may be rejected, a preference right to enter lands under other provisions of the homestead law; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CANTRILL: A bill (H. R. 5319) granting an increase of pension to Lizzie W. Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5320) granting an increase of pension to Leslie C. Holmes; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 5321) granting an increase of pension to Betsey Hodgett; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WELTY: A bill (H. R. 5322) granting an increase of pension to Luke Arnold; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WOOD of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 5323) granting a pension to Augusta E. Robinson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. DAVIDSON: Petition of T. J. Bylow, Ole Olsen, and others, of Neenah, Wis., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Typographical Union No. 211, Oshkosh, Wis., against increase in postal rates on second-class matter; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of B. A. Hoffman, Grand Knight Oshkosh Council No. 614, Knights of Columbus, Oshkosh, Wis., pledging support of the organization to the Government; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Columbia Council, No. 209, Royal Arcanum, of Fond du Lac, Wis., favoring universal military training; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petitions of Local Union No. 445, United Association of Plumbers and Steam Fitters, of Manitowoc, Wis., and United Garment Workers of America, of Oshkosh, Wis., favoring food-control bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of Frank A. Miller and others, of Manitowoc, Wis., against bill prohibiting manufacture of beer; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HERSEY: Petition of Horace B. Sellers and other citizens, of Orono, Me., urging national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HULBERT: Petition of 71 employees of National Cloak & Suit Co., New York City, on daylight saving; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of conference of mayors and other city officials of State of New York, relative to prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a petition or memorial of Bronx Emergency War Committee, relative to regulating price of coal; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of employees in engine, train, and yard service of New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, favoring passage of the Lever bill for food control; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of Henry C. Mainc, of Rochester, N. Y., against prohibition as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorial of Indiana State Council of Defense, asking that the President of the United States be given power to fix the price of coal; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of New York Branch of the Association of Collegiate Alumnæ, relative to protecting morals of those in training camps; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, favoring daylight-saving bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Petition of Local 217, Carpenters and Joiners, of Westerly, R. I., favoring passage of Lever food bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, resolution of Woman's Christian Temperance Union and Association of Collegiate Alumnæ of Rhode Island, favoring establishment of zones around military camps prohibiting sale of liquor and presence of prostitutes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Trinity Baptist Church, of Providence, R. I., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petitions of Lonsdale (R. I.) Presbyterian Church; Greenville (R. I.) Women's War Relief Association; Samuel H. Tingley, of Providence, R. I.; and Manton (R. I.) Branch of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, favoring passage of prohibition legislation as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LITTLE: Petitions of 200 citizens of Fort Scott, 86 citizens of La Harpe, 93 citizens of Olathe, 112 citizens of Baldwin, 37 citizens of Mound City, 100 citizens of Kansas City, 97 citizens of Paola, 28 citizens of Pomona, 39 citizens of Gardner, and 63 citizens of Rosedale, all in the State of Kansas; 45 citizens of Mocakettee College, St. Paul, Minn.; and 1,200 citizens of Nome, Alaska, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: Petition of Local 217, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Westerly, R. I., favoring passage of the Lever bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: Memorial of Frenchman Valley Farmers' Union, No. 251, Haxtun, Colo., asking that all men trained and engaged in actual production of live stock and other food products be left on farms, but given like honors with those called to Army and Navy; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Petition of citizens of White County, Ind., favoring prohibition as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 5, 1917.

(Legislative day of Thursday, June 28, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Vermont, praying that malt and vinous liquors be included in the enactment of prohibition legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions from the Methodist Episcopal Churches of Iona, Hesperia, Calumet, Hancock, Leaton, Stockbridge, Lowell, Battle Creek, Onekama, Bellevue, St. Ignace, Maryville, Detroit, Norway, and Fremont; of the Friends Church of Ypsilanti; of the First Christian Church of Lansing; of the Epworth League of Kalamazoo; of the Second Reformed Church of Muskegon; of the Mayflower Congregational Church, of Lansing; of the First Baptist Church of Calumet; of the Waterman Avenue Evangelical Church, of Detroit; of the First Baptist Church of Lansing; of the First Baptist Church of Detroit; from the Memorial Baptist Church of Jackson; and of sundry citizens of Chesaning, all in the State of Michigan, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. I have received a large number of letters in the nature of petitions from manufacturers, merchants, and professional men, all citizens of my State, asking for the adoption of national prohibition. I ask that they be received and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE presented petitions of the Portsmouth Branch, Council National Defense, Portsmouth; of the Eastwood Congregational Church, Hamilton; of 200 members First Presbyterian Church, Columbus; of the Young Men's Bible Class, First United Brethren Church, Dayton; of three congregations of Vanlue; of 700 members United Brethren Church, Fostoria; of Forest Avenue Presbyterian Church, Dayton; of members Presbyterian Church, Nelsonville; of 151 members Bible Class, Blanchester; of members Christian Endeavor Society, Central Christian Church, Youngstown; of the State Convention Ohio Christian Endeavorers, 1,500 strong, representing 80,000 Christian young people, Hamilton; of 750 Christian Endeavorers, Mahoning County; of the Christian Endeavorers, Plymouth Congregational Church, Hamilton; of the Dry Federation, Brown County; of the Youngstown District Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Geneva; of the Prospect Methodist Episcopal Church and of the Prospect Baptist Church, Prospect; of Eagle Creek, Mount Moriah, Jenera, and Arlington congregations, Arlington; of Akron District Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, representing a constituency of 25,000; of the Brotherhood of Westerville Methodist Episcopal Church, Westerville; of Wayne County Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Wooster; of Good Government League, Cambridge; of three troops of Boy Scouts, Cambridge; of 1,000 members First United Presbyterian Church, Cambridge; of of Men's Bible Class of the Presbyterian Church of Troy; of Union Reformed Church, of Republic; of Salem Sunday School, of Republic; of Union Reformed Sunday School, of Republic, all in the State of Ohio, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of the Hamilton County Liquor League, of Cincinnati; of Home City Lodge, No. 148, International Association of Machinists, of Springfield; of the Brewery Workers' Union of Columbus; of the National Association of White Corn Millers, of Cincinnati; of the Labor Trades Council of Hamilton; of Local Union No. 2, International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen, of Toledo; of Hamilton Lodge, No. 241, International Association of Machinists, of Hamilton; of Stationary Firemen's Local No. 49, of Cincinnati; of the Federation of Labor of Cleveland; of United Brewery Workers of America of Cincinnati; of Ohio Brewing Co., of Columbus; of Niles Liquor Dealers' Association, of Niles; of Martin Mason Brewing Co., of Hamilton; of the Cleveland Brewers' Exchange, of Cleveland; of the Consumers' Brewing Co., of Newark; and of Gund Brewing Co., of Cleveland, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRADY:

A bill (S. 2550) to grant a certain area of land to the city of Boise, State of Idaho, for street purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. KNOX:

A bill (S. 2551) to correct the military record of John L. O'Mara and grant him an honorable discharge; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO PENDING BILL.

Mr. GRONNA submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if there is no pending amendment, I ask that the reading of the bill may be proceeded with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a pending amendment. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, in the committee amendment, at the end thereof, in line 21, strike out the words "foods, feeds, and fuels," and in lieu insert "necessaries as defined in this act."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate I desire this morning to speak upon the bill—not so much concerning its general provisions as concerning the subject of coal as affected thereby.

If I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, I wish to call attention briefly to Senate joint resolution No. 77, introduced by myself and relating to the subject of the price fixing and distribution of coal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the number of the joint resolution?

Mr. POMERENE. Senate joint resolution No. 77. In the preamble to the joint resolution I have attempted to recite the conditions prevailing throughout the country. If it should be passed the Congress will thereby declare that it is essential for the national security and defense of the country to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution of coal at a reasonable price for the Government and people of the United States and to protect them against exorbitant prices for such coal.

The preamble of the joint resolution recites further that the prices of coal within the United States have reached an exorbitant level; that a large body of consumers both domestic and industrial are unable to obtain a necessary supply of this prime necessary; and that a failure to procure this supply would impair the health and strength of the people of the United States upon whom the national defense depends and cause the partial or complete cessation of many industries.

I shall not take the time to read the whole of the preamble. I wish now to call particular attention to the provisions of section 1. It recites—

That it is necessary and proper, in order to execute the powers of Congress to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, and in order to properly and efficiently provide for the common defense, that the President of the United States shall be authorized and empowered, and he is hereby authorized and empowered, whenever and wherever in his judgment it shall be necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to fix the prices of coal, whether sold at the mine or elsewhere, and whether sold by the coal-mine operator or dealer in coal, and to regulate the methods of sale, routes of transportation, and the distribution, apportionment, or storage of such coal among merchants, domestic consumers, industrial consumers, common carriers, and others, and of export.

And that this price and this distribution may be fixed by the President through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission or some other agency.

The next section gives to the President the power, when in his judgment occasion requires, to requisition and take over the mines and their appurtenances so as to supply the public with coal. I do not quote the language fully.

The third section provides that when this price is fixed, and it is not satisfactory to the operator, he may begin suit for the difference between that which is allowed by order of the President and that which he thinks he is entitled to receive.

There is a provision in the joint resolution also authorizing the President to fix the wages of the miners when necessary. I desire to say with respect to that provision that it was only intended that it should apply in the event the President should take over the mines and he would appear in the place of the employer himself. I do not believe that the Government should fix the scale of wages while the mines are under the control of and being occupied by the coal operators themselves.

Having in mind these provisions, I desire also to call the attention of the chairman to the provisions of the pending bill. The bill attempts to give certain powers to the President for the successful prosecution of the war and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy. In section 8 I read the following:

That the President is authorized, from time to time (a) to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy—or any other public use connected with the common defense.

And note the following language—

The suggestion I desire to make to the chairman of the committee is this: Is the language "or any other public use connected with the common defense" comprehensive enough to permit the President to take control of these mines when, in his judgment, it might be necessary for the purpose of obtaining a supply of coal for our transportation systems or for the operation of our factories?

Mr. GORE. That question will be answered by referring the Senator to another section, I think section 10. I am not familiar with the sections in the new print, but it is my impression that it gives express power to the President to commandeer factories, mines, oil and gas wells, and other plants for the production of anything in connection with the Army and Navy.

Mr. POMERENE. The language has been materially modified. I do not intend to take time this morning to pass an opinion upon the sufficiency of that language, but I desire to suggest, if I may, the wisdom of making this language so comprehensive that there can be no question as to what the judgment of Congress is.

Mr. GORE. If the Senator will look at section 9 I think his question will be answered.

Mr. POMERENE. I may discuss that feature a little later.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is undoubtedly correct in his statement.

Mr. POMERENE. What I desire to impress upon the Senate is this: We have heard a good deal of discussion as to the constitutionality of measures of this character. For myself I have no doubt that in time of war, and as a measure for the purpose of prosecuting the war, we have the power to fix the prices and to commandeer these properties whenever it may be necessary for the common defense. I will add further that, in my judgment, it is necessary for the common defense when we find that the present high prices of coal and other necessities are substantially interfering with the industrial life of the community and thereby impairing our national efficiency.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me just a moment. My desire is that there shall be a clear finding by Congress that it is necessary to place these plenary powers in the hands of the President to be exercised by him when in his judgment it is necessary for the national defense. In other words, if there is a finding of fact upon this subject by Congress and by the executive branch of the Government the courts would be less likely to interfere with the operation of the law. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I see the point the Senator has in mind and undoubtedly it ought to be met. If it will not interfere with him I will have the first part of section 9 read at this point.

Mr. POMERENE. I referred to that section just a moment ago, if the Senator please, and I would a little rather, if it makes no difference to the Senator, proceed with my argument in the way in which I have planned it.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. POMERENE. We have had some hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce on the question of coal. The operators with singular unanimity have charged the present high prices to the shortage of cars. With all due respect to what they have said I am convinced that the shortage of the car supply has been the occasion for the increase and not the cause of the increase.

I do not want to be understood to say that the car shortage, and there has been a car shortage, does not to some extent affect the price, but the primary cause for the increase in these prices has not been car shortage. It has not been the rule of supply and demand. It has been, as some of the operators themselves said, the "human element" which permitted the operators to get all that the necessities of the situation would permit them to get.

Now, let me say a word on the subject of car shortage. The total number of railroad-owned freight cars in the country is 2,350,000. The total number of privately owned freight cars in the country is 225,000. The grand total is 2,575,000 cars. The highest estimate of car shortage that has come to my notice was several months ago when the total car shortage in the country reached in one month 147,000 cars. In other words, expressed in terms of per cent, the total shortage in the country was 5.7.

Some of these operators have said that they have had as low as 20 per cent of their supply. That may be so; but it does not, in my judgment, apply to that industry as a whole, and it does not apply to the condition generally throughout the country.

I have a statement here which was issued by the special committee on national defense of the American Railway Association, through its chairman, Mr. Fairfax Harrison. He said, in a circular letter which he issued to the railroads, that it is possible that the equivalent of 779,000 additional freight cars might be added to the present equipment by repairing cars more quickly, heavier loading, and more rapid movement. Without taking the time of the Senate to read the whole of this statement, I desire to call attention to this paragraph:

The increased number of freight cars available for service without any outlay of capital can be accomplished as follows: To quicker repairs, 64,000; to quicker movement of cars, 515,000; to making an average heavier loading, 200,000.

The railroads recently gave orders to the car builders for 100,000 freight cars additional to those now in operation, and that number is now being constructed, though the car manufacturers have been delayed and hampered by reason of the fact that they have not been able to get the necessary iron and steel as promptly as they would like to have it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator about the length of time required to build these cars.

Mr. POMERENE. I can not answer the Senator.

On the subject of car shortage, about which a number of our Ohio operators were complaining when before the committee, I called their attention to a letter which I had received, under date of June 21, 1917, written by Gen. O. H. Hughes, the chairman of the Ohio Public Utilities Commission, and who has served our State most efficiently under four different governors. I say that to show the great confidence which our governors and our people have had in his ability, his integrity, and his intelligence. A paragraph of his letter reads as follows:

Transportation conditions in Ohio as to coal are very greatly improved, the Toledo & Ohio Central and the Hocking Valley Railways—are now furnishing 100 per cent cars for that service, while other railroads have made considerable improvement. Nevertheless prices of coal have not come down, although the operators have charged the high level of prices to lack of transportation facilities.

And these railroads run through the mining regions of the State—

Mr. REED. What is the date of that?

Mr. POMERENE. June 21.

In the State of Ohio during the year 1915, when the prices of coal were substantially normal, the total production was 22,000,000 tons. I may say that a part of that year covered the period of the Ohio coal strike, and that will account for the low production of that year. During the year 1916 the total production was 34,000,000 tons.

The attorney general of the State of Ohio, Hon. Joseph McGhee, is my authority for the statement that for four months—the first four months of this year—the monthly increase in production over last year was 875,000 tons. Still these prices have been soaring skyward.

The cross-examination of these coal operators before this committee will prove conclusively certain facts, and they are corroborated by the information of every intelligent citizen of Ohio.

First, that during the first six months of this war there were just as many laboring men employed in our Ohio factories as there were during the corresponding months of the years 1916 or 1915; secondly, the product of those factories during these same six months has been greater than it was during the corresponding six months in 1916 or 1915; thirdly, during the six months of this year the manufacturers did not have any extra supply of coal on hand or, if any, it was normal; fourthly, it must, therefore, follow that as much coal, if not more coal, was consumed by these factories during the six months of this year as was consumed during the corresponding six months of last year or the year before; and, fifthly, we conclude that there must have been as much coal transported during these six months of this year as was transported during the corresponding six months of either 1916 or 1915, and yet these operators say that the railroads are responsible for this shortage.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not want to interrupt the trend of the Senator's argument, but I want to call his attention to a condition which, I am told by good authority, exists in regard to coal production and consumption. It is, in substance, this: That the large consumers of coal, particularly the transportation companies, have contracts with the operators for practically their entire output of coal at a maximum price of $3 per ton, with provisos in their agreements that in the event that coal should sell for less than the contract price these contractees should have the benefit of that reduction, and that these contracts are so favorable to the operators, and so much in excess of what they were accustomed to secure at wholesale prices from these large consumers, that they are prefectly willing to run at 60 or 70 per cent of their maximum production or of their regular production, perhaps more willing to do so, than to increase their operations as they might do, which would subject them possibly to a reduction of price in the market, and thereby result in loss from their standing contracts.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator's statement is substantially correct, and I shall have something to say on that matter as I go along.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator, then, is aware of that situation?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I am.

Mr. President, in order that we may have a bird's-eye view of the entire situation in the country, I desire to send to the desk, to be read, a letter from the Director of the Geological Survey, which was sent to me a few days ago, though it does not seem to be dated. I ask that the letter be read. There are certain exhibits here supporting the statements of the Director of the Geological Survey, which I ask to be incorporated in the RECORD, but without reading the statements themselves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY, WASHINGTON.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR POMERENE: In response to your telephone request of yesterday I am inclosing herewith five statements prepared by the Geological Survey to show the comparative figures of monthly shipments of bituminous coal and beehive coke over the leading railroads of the United States. These statistics indicate that in the first two months of the present year the rate of production was less than a year ago; that in March there was some improvement in the output, and that the shipments in April and May were greatly in excess of those in the corresponding months of 1916. In fact, the increase in the last two months (which increase is being exceeded in June) was so great that the aggregate quantity of coal that was loaded on the railroads and sent forward to consumers, from January to the end of May, 1917, was from 7 to 10 per cent greater than in the same period in 1916. Measured in quantity this increase represents thousands of cars and millions of tons. Practically every district and coal field has contributed its share toward this increase, which has been made possible by increased car supply and steadier work on the part of the miners.

The shipments of Pennsylvania anthracite during the first five months of 1917 were about 2,000,000 tons greater than in the same period of 1916.

A careful estimate of the production of coal in the first six months of 1917 is now being prepared for Secretary Lane, and it is expected that it will be published the first of next week.

Yours, very truly,
GEO. OTIS SMITH,
Director.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the statements confirmatory of the letter be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in the States of Ohio and West Virginia and in western Pennsylvania the increase in the cost of production of coal is not to exceed 30 cents per ton. In Ohio, I am giving the outside figure when I say that the cost of production, except perhaps in a very few inferior mines, does not exceed from $1.40 to $1.50 or $1.60 a ton at the mouth of the mine. In the western Pennsylvania district the cost of coal production at the mouth of the mine runs from $1.10 to $1.30 a ton, with an average of about $1.20 a ton.

On June 15, 1917, the following prices of coal were quoted in the city of Cleveland by different coal operators: Kendall coal, which is the No. 8 Pennsylvania, $5.30 per ton, Cleveland; R. A. Wood coal, Goshen, $5.25; Goff Kirby, $5.25; Lorain Coal & Dock Co., $5.25; Schroder Kelley, $5.45; Baier Coal, Coshocton, $5.25; O. & P., $5.70; M. A. Hanna & Co., $5. These prices are in carload lots in Cleveland.

In wagon-load lots, Pocahontas lump coal, produced in West Virginia, was quoted as follows: Albright, $9.25 per ton; Zett—the name is abbreviated here, but I think it is Zettlemeyer—$9.75; Goff Kirby, $9 per ton. Those prices prevail generally throughout the State of Ohio. I will give some comparative figures a little later in my remarks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. POMERENE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very much impressed with what the Senator has said about the necessity of promptly meeting the fuel situation. I heard his inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture as to whether the language of the bill was sufficient to authorize the practical commandeering of the coal supply of the mines. Now, the Senator has reached a point in his recapitulation of prices which leads me to inquire whether, if there is in this bill only power enough to enable the Government to supply its own necessities, which are larger than they have ever been before, what is left over of the output of these mines will not of necessity be higher to the consumer in industrial enterprises than heretofore?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I will say in answer to the Senator from Michigan that at the present time in Ohio and Pennsylvania and West Virginia the operators are refusing to contract their coal even at the present exorbitant prices—I am speaking generally now—because they were not anticipating Government action and because they expected these prices to advance still higher.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, if the Senator will permit a word further——

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I notice that the output of the West Virginia mines was larger last year than in any previous year of its history. It aggregated the tremendous output of 89,165,774 tons. So there is no shortage of supply. But I desire to avoid for our commercial and industrial people the awful dilemma in which they will be placed if the Government supplies only itself from these coal mines and leaves the manufacturers and private consumers to make their own bargain for the moiety. In a climate that is somewhat trying about half of the year, I shudder at the prospect that confronts our people in reference to the fuel supply.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the Senator's mind and mine are running in the same direction.

Many of these operators make the statement that they have old contracts at greatly reduced figures. That is true in some instances; but, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has referred to the question, it is likewise true that there are many loopholes in those contracts, which serve as a means of escape from what were believed to be the original contract terms, and in many instances the operators are trying to evade the conditions of the contract. I have here before me now a statement of an account rendered by the Ajax Block Coal Co., of Columbus, Ohio, to the John Evans Lime & Stone Co. I wish Senators would note these figures, if they are interested in this subject. This invoice was issued January 26 and 27 for 89.4 tons of coal at $1.10 per ton, or a total of $98.34. On January 19 the same coal dealers rendered another statement to the John Evans Lime & Stone Co. for 109 tons at $4.25 a ton, or $463.25. Its first statement was for Hocking run of mine; the second was for West Virginia run of mine. The grade of coal is substantially the same, and the price under normal conditions is substantially the same. I asked the John Evans Lime & Stone Co. for an explanation of this difference in the figures. I read the telegram received from them under date of June 25, 1917:

Had a contract with Ajax Co. for our fall supply of coal; had all bills paid up, and they tried to break contract; could not get coal from them other than open-market prices. Consequently, we purchased open-market coal; then refused to pay for same until they resumed shipment on contract. That is one way we forced the middlemen to eliminate some of their profits. There is no difference in price of West Virginia coal and Hocking coal, except freight. Both of them in the mine-run grade are very inferior coal. The point that I wanted you to see: The miners receive no more pay for producing this coal, and still the coal companies or middlemen advanced the price 300 per cent.

I have another letter from Mr. Homer McDaniel, a business man, whom I have known for 25 years. He is at the head of the Sheriff Street Market & Storage Co., Cleveland, Ohio. I simply wisb to call attention to the prices:

During the year 1916 and up to April 1, 1917, our company paid Zettlemeyer Coal Co. $2.15 per ton, delivered in our bins at the market house, for Youghiogheny slack from mine "299," produced by the Pittsburgh Coal Co., and that we are now paying from the same source and to the same company $5.45 for the same coal, and even at this price we are unable to make contracts for any period.

To show that this situation of attempting to break coal contracts is pretty general, I have a letter, with the contract made by a firm of manufacturers in the city of Springfield, Ohio, with the Norfolk & Chesapeake Coal Co. The company had contracted to deliver 1,000 tons under date of August 1, 1916, at $1.10 per ton f. o. b. cars mine. They furnished about 820 tons of this coal. Then they sought to avoid the contract, and insisted that the manufacturers should pay the current prices, which ran about $3.75 per ton. I am advised this morning by these same people that this company has within the past few days signified their willingness to carry out the terms of the contract, which they had refused to comply with for many months. Other manufacturers in Springfield have had a similar experience.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some further facts as illustrating the effects that these high prices have upon the industries of the country. In my own city of Canton—a very substantial manufacturing center, with a population of 75,000—for years we invited industries, and one of the inducements to locate in our city was that we could furnish them coal, run of mine, at 90 cents per ton f. o. b. mines. The manufacturers in that city are now compelled to pay from $4.50 to $5.50 per ton for this same coal. We have several rolling mills in our city. It is a well-recognized rule that it takes one carload of coal to roll one carload of steel sheets. The difference between 90-cent coal and $5 coal means an increase of $4.10 in the cost of steel sheets in converting them from the steel bars to the steel sheets. I call attention to this fact as indicating the effect that this high price of coal has on the steel industry generally throughout the country.

I have another letter here from Erie, Pa. In part the writer says:

A year ago bituminous slack was being sold at a good profit at around $1.30 a ton at the mines. Since the coal dealers arbitrarily raised the price last winter the operators have taken the cue, and now have the price up around $4.50 a ton at the mine, or an advance of 250 per cent.

As you know, their actual excess cost over last year is only 25 or 30 cents a ton.

Now, note this, please:

It takes a little over a ton of coke to make 1 ton of pig iron, so that pig iron legitimately went up $8 or $9 when coal went up.

It takes, for some grades of steel, a ton of coal to convert the pig into the finished product of steel, and in some cases it takes more. Therefore bring down the price of coal to where it belongs and you will bring down the price of everything.

On Tuesday I received a very interesting letter from a large steel company. I do not feel at liberty to give the name of the company, but I am going to read a portion of this letter for the purpose of showing the effect upon steel prices:

The contract price of standard Connellsville coke at the ovens, for the period of six months or a year, ranged from $2.20 to $2.30 per ton up to November, 1916. At that time the price for spot coke began to advance rapidly, and it became increasingly difficult to contract for future deliveries at any price. It is now impossible to make any contracts for future delivery of coke, all purchases being made at spot prices for immediate delivery.

Now, note the prices:

During the past week the price reached $15.50 per ton, ovens, and the last quotation on last Saturday was $13.50 per ton, ovens.

Making the largest allowances in every direction, the price of $2.30 per ton may be distributed as follows: For 1½ tons of coal, at $1.20 per ton, $1.80, and for coking 50 cents per ton. As a matter of fact, 1 ton of coke should be made from 1¼ tons of standard Connellsville coal. The normal profit on this coal is about 15 cents per ton.

To produce 1 ton of pig iron requires about 1½ tons of standard Connellsville coke, making the cost of coke without freight about $2.85 per ton of pig iron.

The smelting of ferroalloys requires a still larger amount of coke per ton. For example, to smelt a ton of 20 per cent spiegel requires 1½ tons of coke, making the cost (at the $2.30 price of coke) $3.45.

At the prices now asked for coke, namely, $13.50 per ton, the cost of coke per ton of pig iron is $17.10—an increase of $14.25 per ton since last October.

On the same $13.50 basis for coke the cost to smelt a ton of spiegel is $20.25—an increase of $16.80 per ton since last October.

Senators will see that by this one operation the price of this class of steel has gone up $16.80 a ton, and if we can reduce the price of coal within reasonable limits we will not only be serving the iron and steel industry but we will be serving every industry in the United States and every one of the more than 20,000,000 families in our country.

I have here some quotations of prices, under date of June 18, by the Philadelphia & Cleveland Coal Co., Rockefeller Building, Cleveland.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is that this year?

Mr. POMERENE. This year.

At the following prices we would furnish a limited tonnage, for prompt shipment, of the various grades of coal offered:

Pocahontas lump	$6.50
Pocahontas egg	6.25
Pocahontas mine run	5.25
Kentucky lump	4.75
West Virginia splint lump	4.75
West Virginia splint nut and slack	4.75
Hocking Valley lump	4.75
Hocking Valley mine run	4.25
No. 8 Pittsburgh, 3-inch lump	4.75
No. 8 Pittsburgh slack	4.75

Above quotations are all net f. o. b. mines and subject to change without notice.

Another very prominent manufacturer—one of the leading bankers and business men in Cleveland—writes that they used to get their No. 8 slack coal at $1.90 per ton delivered. They have been obliged to purchase in the open market to keep their plant going, paying $4.50 to $5.75 per ton for the same coal from parties other than the one with whom they have a contract.

I have a very interesting letter from a prominent lawyer in Cleveland which indicates some of the methods that have been adopted by the coal people. I may say that I have known this lawyer for many years, and he is a very reputable gentleman. A paragraph of his letter reads as follows:

It seems that the opportunity to gouge the public presented itself when the railroads failed to furnish cars for transportation, and also when cars did arrive in the city the railroads neither had the engines nor employees in sufficient numbers to put the coal into the respective coal yards. Right here, however, I would like to know why it was that thousands of carloads of coal were held in this city, demurrage paid upon them, and then released when the price got up around $7.50 to $8?

Under date of June 25, the attorney general of Ohio, who has been investigating this subject with very great care, wrote me that he had been down in the Nelsonville coal-mining region, and he found this situation: The larger operators there are subletting privileges in their mines, and they pay to these miners 99 cents per ton at the mouth of the mine. The operators sell this coal, for which they pay 99 cents at the mine, at approximately $4 per ton.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that that 99 cents is the cost of the coal mined or the cost of the coal not including the mining?

Mr. POMERENE. That, as I understand his letter, represents the amount which is paid to the miner who digs it and brings it to the mouth of the mine.

Another prominent manufacturer of Springfield, Ohio, stated to me personally in my office on June 25, 1917, that he could not contract for his supply for his factories at even $5 a ton. Now, they have to pay for free coal $5.50 per ton and upward f. o. b. Springfield, Ohio; others, f. o. b. mines.

Even the colleges in Ohio are not able to get their supply except at these exorbitant figures.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask the Senator whether there is any claim that it is impossible to get miners to work in these mines? What is the difficulty about getting out the coal?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, perhaps before the Senator came in I referred to their claim that there was a shortage of cars. In these mines, ordinarily, the coal is dumped from the mine immediately into the car. Some of these mines have been shut down. Some of them have been operating only two or three days in the week. Some of the miners have left these mines to go to other mines where they got more regular employment. Conditions prevail in certain localities whereby there may be a lack of coal miners; in others, lack of car supply; but speaking generally, throughout the country the car supply has been greater or as great during the last six months as it was during the corresponding six months of last year or the year before; and that is conclusively evidenced by the fact that more coal has been mined and transported than ever before.

I have here a letter from Mr. O. K. Shimansky, who is secretary of the Ohio State Board of Commerce and also secretary of the Ohio Coal Bureau, which, as I understand, is an association of the large coal consumers. He says:

The executive committee met here a few days ago and canvassed the coal situation.

This letter is dated June 18, 1917:

Reports of the bureau indicate that prices are up because of reckless bidding by coal consumers. There is no coal shortage. It is evident to every coal user that he can get coal if he will pay the price.

That is the situation all over Ohio and western Pennsylvania and Kentucky and West Virginia, and I dare say in most of the States throughout the Middle West.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if there has been any unusual demand for coal? Is the price influenced by a large increase in demand?

Mr. POMERENE. There has been some increase in demand, due to the increased industrial activities in Ohio and elsewhere, and that has some effect; but I shall have a word to say on that subject after I have gone on a little further.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to suggest that perhaps that could be figured out on a pretty nearly definite basis.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know but that I might just as well answer that now, and I answer it in this way:

There was an investigation in Ohio during the past few months, in which these very coal operators that are now getting $3 per ton profit said that during last year and during normal times they would have been content with a profit of 10 cents per ton. Now, the situation is this: These gentlemen who are trying to throw the responsibility for all their shortcomings upon the car supply say: "Furnish us cars and we will furnish the coal at reasonable prices." Well, the railroads have enough shortcomings to answer for; but that does not justify these coal operators, when they have had more coal hauled by the railroads than ever before in their experience, in charging two and three times the normal prices. The logic of the situation is this: We have a supply of coal on hand. It is taken to an industrial center. The consumers have become somewhat nervous about present conditions. They are afraid that their coal supply is going to give out, and they begin to bid, and the price has gone up to $6 and $7 per ton, even $8 and $9 per ton, for domestic purposes. They try to excuse themselves under the law of supply and demand. They would be nearer the truth if they would state the fact that their greed for high profits is such that they are willing to take the last farthing out of the consumer's pockets if they can get it.

They place the responsibility upon the consumers, but, while all the consumers in the country are complaining upon this subject, I have yet to hear that any consumer ever knocked down an operator and forced these excessive prices into the operator's pockets.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, is it not a fact that coal consigned from the mines to buyers throughout the country has been arrested in the course of its shipment and thrown upon sidings and held there and sold again and rerouted at an advanced price?

Mr. POMERENE. That has been done.

I have other letters here that indicate this situation as one of the causes for car shortage. These coal operators and coal brokers ordered large amounts of coal. They were hauled to centers of consumption. They were placed upon a sidetrack at a time when the prices were being boosted, and they paid the demurrage on these cars to the railroad company while they were waiting for the increased price. If I can put my fingers on a letter, I want to call the attention of the Senate specifically to this matter.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If that kind of evidence exists, why is it not pretty clear evidence of a violation of the antitrust act?

Mr. POMERENE. There is no doubt about the fact, as I have stated it. It would have a very wholesome effect if a few of these men were sent to the penitentiary. I do not mean to say that all of them are responsible for it. Many of them are very good citizens.

I have a letter from Judge F. M. Marriott, one of the leading lawyers in Ohio, whom I have had the pleasure of knowing for 25 years. He gives me these facts:

We know that up until last winter the producers of coal furnished the same coal—

The same coal which he speaks of in a former paragraph—at the mine for $1, $1.25, and $1.35 a ton, making it cost the common people when it reached their homes $2.50 to $3 a ton, whereas since the contagion of greed and avarice took possession of the coal barons the price of this same coal has gone to as high as $7 and $8 a ton at their homes.

Now, note this. In illustration of the truth of the statement which was made to him he cites the following fact:

One of the most prominent coal corporations in Ohio, through an officer and its representative, made a statement to the coal dealer—

He gives the name here—that their company had paid $400 a week demurrage on coal in order to prevent its unloading while prices were being boosted, and that the company realized $1,600 a week by so doing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator pardon me just a minute? I want to give another fact from this letter. He speaks of a certain coal corporation down in West Virginia and certain stockholders who had subscribed for their stock and are now owners of the stock of this company, in part, and he gets this information:

One of the four brothers took stock to the amount of $5,000, one to the amount of $2,500, and one to the amount of $10,000, and their books and receipts will show that they have received back in dividends more than double the amount paid for the stock within the last two years.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. In connection with the paragraph the Senator had just read when I took the floor a moment ago, to the effect that this company had paid out a large sum for demurrage on cars, of course the act of one man in doing that or one company might probably not have a great effect on the market, but assume that that was pretty general, so that a rise in price could be produced by it, is there any doubt in the Senator's mind as an attorney that it would be most conclusive evidence of a conspiracy in restraint of trade?

Mr. POMERENE. It would be very persuasive evidence.

Mr. REED. I keep insisting on this because I have insisted all along if the Department of Justice would get busy with its vast machinery I think we would very soon find a change in the situation.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that would have very great effect, but I want to remind Senators, and I measure my words, that the man who will enter into a conspiracy to charge $6, $7, and $8 a ton for coal when it only ought to be worth $2 will very carefully attempt to cover up his tracks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to repeat once more for the RECORD an illustration that came close home of the improper manner in which the effort has been made to put up the price of coal. The judge of the circuit court of the county next to the one in which I live, 6 miles from Atlanta, was in the city within the past week. From him I learned that during the latter part of last winter 1,200 carloads of coal were kept upon a sidetrack between the cities of Atlanta and Decatur for over two weeks, while the people of both places were short of coal; and when he brought it to the attention of the grand jury and a committee went one afternoon to begin their investigation and returned the next morning to continue it, the coal was gone. It was perfectly evident that the 1,200 carloads of coal were being kept upon a sidetrack to produce a coal famine and to force up the price.

Mr. POMERENE. I would have been very greatly surprised if the good people of Georgia had been saved from being victimized by this same crowd of operators and dealers.

I have another letter from Mr. O. K. Shimansky, secretary of the Ohio State Board of Commerce. He refers to a statement which went out from Washington here the other day to the effect that the operators had beneficently agreed to take $3 per ton at the mouth of the mine. I have a statement here somewhere on my desk—I can not locate it at this moment—which indicates that the price in the Ohio mine was to be $3 to $3.50 per ton. He adds this:

If they were able to sell coal a year ago or so at 10 cents in excess of the cost price and make money, why can they not sell now at 50 cents in excess of the cost and make more money? The best figures we are able to obtain indicate that it is now costing about $1.27 per ton to mine coal in the southern Ohio district. On this basis coal at $4 at the mine is twice too high.

Of course, $2 per ton at that cost for mining would give a profit of 73 cents per ton, when heretofore they have been content with a profit of 10 cents per ton.

I am not here to say that 10 cents per ton is a sufficient profit at the present time, but I am here to say that when it only costs $1.20 a ton to produce the coal it is outrageous to even think of charging a consumer $3 per ton.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, that he might with perfect propriety compliment the Secretary of War for his refusal to be bound by such a contract.

Mr. POMERENE. I do, sir. The country owes the Secretary of War a debt of gratitude.

Mr. REED. And the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. POMERENE. And the Secretary of the Navy. I desire to say that so far as Secretary Lane is concerned—and I have the profoundest respect for him—I do not believe he has been able to get detailed information concerning the cost of production in the coal fields west of the Allegheny Mountains. I have no doubt that he felt when the price was about to be reduced from $5 and $6 per ton to $3 per ton that that was doing a real service to the country, and it was, in one sense of the word; but it is still too high at that figure.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, but Secretary Lane lives in California, far from the coal-mining sections. Secretary Baker lives in Ohio, in an atmosphere that is surcharged with this very vital question, and I think his judgment and his conduct are worthy of the highest praise in rejecting scornfully the contract presented to him the other day.

Mr. POMERENE. The Secretary of the Ohio State Board of Commerce furnished me this information:

> The secretary of an Ohio corporation which has big mining interests in West Virginia says it does not seem true that we are getting $4 a ton for coal that we sold for 90 cents a ton a year ago. During the last month or two we have sold our coal at the mine at $3 to $3.50 a ton. We had 15,000 tons on hand and have sold that at $4 a ton at the mine, although we had no idea that we would get that price. The fact of the matter is we were offered $4 and could not turn the proposition down. I know a man in West Virginia who is actually getting $4.50 and $5 per ton at the mine for coal. This is outrageous, but the operators can not help it.

Mr. President, I desire to present a few figures from a manufacturer of automobile and buggy tops at Tiffin, Ohio. He gives the prices of coal. They are very interesting. In 1911 the price of coal was $1.20—this is what they paid for it—" in 1912, $1.25; in 1913, $1.35; in 1914, $1.45; in 1915, $1.35; in 1916, $1.50 plus 90 cents per ton for freight." Tiffin is west and north of the coal region of Ohio. "Recently asked for quotations of same company, price made for same coal, was $5.25 per ton plus 90 cents for freight."

A large manufacturer of bricks and a large consumer of coal writes me that he has conclusive evidence—and I know from the facts he gives in his letter, which I will not put in the RECORD—his information is reliable. He says that No. 8 coal in the Pennsylvania district cost at the mine, including everything, $1.30 per net ton. The prices on practically all coal run from $4.50 to $5.70 per net ton. Then he adds this:

> Another peculiar thing is that, although it is almost impossible to get coal under contract, due to car and labor shortage, when you pay the high price you are able to get all you want, and there always seems to be some way to get it through.

And that is the experience of nearly every manufacturer in the great Middle West.

Another good friend, from Alliance, Ohio, a prominent and a very intelligent business man, writes me:

> Alliance is comparatively close to coal fields—

In fact, there are some coal mines right on the outskirts of Alliance—> and yet the price asked for coal here at present is $6.50 per ton, with the promise of $10 coal this winter. The dealers are getting $4.50 per ton at the mine when it should be produced and a good profit result at $2 a ton.

Another man, from Mechanicsburg, Ohio, writes that soft coal was formerly retailed there at around $3 per ton, was advanced to $5 in April, and dealers are now asking $7.50 per ton.

Another man at Ashtabula writes me it is retailing at $7.25 per ton.

I have quite a large number of letters here, and could fill the ordinary RECORD of a day's proceedings in the Senate with them, all of them to substantially the same effect.

But I want to call the attention of the Senate to this further situation.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Will the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator has read a great many letters from prominent citizens of his State showing the exorbitant prices that are being required for the product of the coal mines of that State by the operators there. It must convince almost anyone that there is some sort of a trust existing between the operators; but what I wish to say, with the consent of the Senator, is that this condition is not confined to the State of Ohio. I have a letter from one of the most prominent and distinguished citizens of Tennessee, from that portion of the State where coal is to be found, written, as he says, in sight of the mountains from which the coal is dug, that forcibly depicts the situation in the State, strongly corroborating what the Senator has so forcibly laid before the Senate; and, with his permission, I should like to have this letter read in this connection.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

KNOXVILLE, TENN., July 2, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The country is being moved by a great fervor of patriotic enthusiasm. The people are in favor of supporting the administration in its attempt to put the world in a condition where it will not be endangered by a powerful and conscienceless Government, such as Germany is. The liberty-bond subscription has been enthusiastically oversubscribed; the Red Cross appeal has been met with universal approbation and support; a food supervisor and conservator has been appointed. The people are advised that they must live economically in dress and diet; they know that increased taxation is inevitable from the large bond issues that are being made by Congress, to forward the mobilization, equipment, and support of the Army; the construction and navigation of both a war and merchant marine; for the manufacture, transportation, and use of ordnance and ammunition, etc.

We see that the Secretary of the Navy, and other Government officials are having supplied to them railroad transportation and fuel at reasonable prices. These things are all right and commendable.

Recently 400 coal operators were called to Washington to confer with a certain board having either actual or advisory powers conferred upon it by the President, and perhaps with the aid of the United States Congress. For 12 months the mass of the people have been groaning under outrageous and unjustifiable coal prices. It was supposed that when this conference was held that a permanent agreement would be secured, obtaining for the citizen and Government just and equal treatment by the coal producers during the continuance of the war and that all people would know what that agreement when consummated is. Immediately upon the adjournment of that conference a long article appeared in our local papers advising that the effect of the agreement entered into was that bituminous coal producers east of the Mississippi River were to be allowed the price of $3 or $3.50 per ton for their coal at the mouth of the mine. The people of Knoxville who have been paying for six months $7 and $7.50 per ton for coal were advised that there might be as much as $1 reduction in coal to local consumers, but that that would depend upon the question as to whether the coal was sold direct by the operator or through some local agency; that in the latter case the prices might be approximately the same as heretofore, since the retail dealers have been complaining that they have not been able to make any profits during the past year, etc.

In to-day's paper we notice that the Cabinet and different members of this board above spoken of differ among themselves about the policy to be pursued in dealing with this and like questions. Some of the members favoring "a liberal profit" to the coal men, etc., for their coal, and others favor the confiscation of the same.

I am writing this letter on my own private account to say that it is absurd for Congress and the President of the United States to ask the people to volunteer and fight the battles of the country and then from their service raise all the food products they can for the support of our Army and that of the entente allies and stint themselves in clothing and diet in order to bring success for the Government, while at the same time the Government, through its heads of department, is allowing a lot of "robbers" to eat up the substance of the people who are denying themselves. In other words, it sounds very much like the speculator and contractor are to be fattened at the expense of the mass of the people. The Government of the United States, through Mr. Daniels, states that he is satisfied with the price made for coal with the Navy Department, at something over $2 per ton. This may suit him and it may suit the President and it may seem to suit Congress, but if the people are not allowed to have their necessary fuel at practically the same price that the Government is paying, then there will be trouble in this country. The people will not stand it, and I for one will vote for no President or head of department or Congressman who is in favor of such discrimination. I will not tolerate such procedure.

Why should John Smith, who is a little farmer, deny himself the comforts of life when Bill Jones, a coal operator in sight of him, is allowed to take all of his earnings—even making it difficult for him to pay his taxes, State and National—for the coal which Jones furnishes his neighbor to keep him from freezing, for his winter coal?

The people do not know what Congress is doing about fixing the prices for the necessities of life during the war. It is perfectly apparent, however, that this must be done either by agreement or by an act of Congress. This last exhibition of patriotism given out by the coal operators since the conference in Washington convinces me that no agreement they will enter into will be observed.

However difficult it is to legislate on this subject without invading the province of the right to make private contracts and other constitutional guaranties, such emergencies render it necessary for arbitrary measures to be enacted for the preservation of the country and the welfare of the people. And I couple these last two factors together because there can be no success of the Government which is not also success for the people. The one can not prosper and the other suffer. One can not be favored and the other oppressed. One treatment must be accorded equally to both.

I write this because I feel strongly and because we do not know what Congress is doing or proposes to do before its adjournment on these vital questions.

You have known me for 40 years, and you know the temper of the Tennessee people also, and must know that something must be speedily done to determine that producers of the necessities of life should be allowed, and they will be cheerfully rewarded, by the mass of the people with a reasonable profit upon their products; but that extortion and robbery of the people under the forms of contract and simulating necessity will not be tolerated and will bring on a revolution inside of our country and dampen and abate the ardor and patriotism of the soldier in the field.

As our immediate Representative, I write to you and ask you to use every power possible to fix, if necessary by act of Congress, the schedule for prices of grain, meat, coal, lumber, iron ore, steel, and all the other indispensable necessities for public and private consumption during the war. And that this shall not be made upon the basis of speculative price things have been sold for within the last year, but upon the cost price of production increased by a reasonable but not exorbitant profit.

You may not know it, but I do; and now tell you the fact that, for several years prior to a year ago, all the coal operators in the Coal Creek, Jellico, and Middlesboro districts, in Tennessee and Kentucky, were supplying coal to the Southern Railway Co. under contracts extending through long periods of time at $1 per ton, and to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. for $1.10 or $1.12½ per ton. Of course, the coal would not have been sold at these prices if it had not been profitable to the operator. During the period spoken of, it is common knowledge that coal at the mouth of the mine could be produced at 80 cents per ton. Since a year ago there has been, as I understand, an advance of about 10 per cent in the wages of the miners. The other expenses of coal operation should not have increased during that period. I know that coal operators, who are now filling contracts for coal extending through a year or more at $3 per ton, are making several thousand dollars per month clear of all expenses.

Another intolerable outrage is taking place here in Tennessee, which affects and will affect the Democratic Party and elections in the future. The State owns its mines and is getting out large measures of coal and shipping them, and instead of selling them direct to the people it is selling them to local coal dealers in the various towns and cities of the State, and the State's coal is furnished to the citizen at the same high price that local dealers get for the output of other mines.

We have been paying here in Knoxville, in sight of the mountain where the coal is dug, $7 and $7.50 per ton for coal since last Christmas. It has been pretended that this condition was brought about by the lack of railroad facilities to transport it, and when that was investigated and corrected other excuses are being trumped up in order to deceive the people and further impose upon them. This sort of stories will not go down. This is simple robbery and nothing else, and so help me God! I will not submit to such intolerable exaction when I know that it is a combination, either express or implied, of a lot of coal dealers to enrich themselves out of the suffering of the mass of the people.

Very truly, yours, W. L. WELEKER.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have been very much interested in the coal discussion, which is being handled so ably by the Senator from Ohio, and I merely desire to say a word in connection therewith. I have received a number of letters on the subject, which I shall ask a little later on to present. They are along the same line as the letter which has been just read at the desk.

One thing more. I know, of my own personal knowledge, that the conditions therein stated are not only true in my particular State, but that the conditions which exist there are worse than those which have been described by the Senator from Ohio.

I live in a city of about 5,000 inhabitants. When the coal market was normal there, we always had trouble in getting cars; but when the price of coal got so unreasonably high, so far beyond reason that everyone wondered, we were then told by our local coal dealers that the combine insisted that we had better fill our bins then, as the price would go still higher. A great many followed their advice and no one had any trouble to get cars or coal. Our people who handle coal there are entirely honest and reliable, but the great coal combine absolutely controlled the entire market, and they were as helpless to protect the consumer as the consumer was to protect himself. I only cite this as an instance, to show that the coal situation is about the same all over the country; and if there is one thing in all the commodities of life that the Government should take hold of and control, it is this great coal industry.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I received a very interesting letter this morning from a friend who lives in Kentucky, whom I have known for many years. He gives a statement as to the dividends which a man received in one little company. He says this man owns $3,000 worth of stock in a mine in the Guyan Valley, which is now paying him $750 per month in dividends, or 300 per cent per year, and the mine has only been in operation something over a year.

I have another interesting letter. I am sorry that I am not privileged to disclose the name of the writer, for he says that if it were disclosed he would be boycotted. He is one of our manufacturers in Ohio of whom we are very proud. He employs several thousand people in his factory. His consumption of coal is something enormous. The price that he has been paying for his coal was $1.70 per ton until April 1, 1917. The companies in this locality—I speak of Pittsburgh now—are selling to the railroad companies their coal at $1.75 per ton, while they want to charge this and other consumers $4 and over per ton. Some gentlemen are seizing their opportunity to make fortunes in a year or two, and to make them out of the necessities of the people. They break, or attempt to break, their contracts and force their customers to buy spot coal at greatly advanced prices.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I heartily concur in what the Senator from Ohio is saying, and I hope this bill will provide punishment for those men who are making such exorbitant profits at the expense of the people.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to a statement that was made by the Geological Survey several years ago relative to the cost of the production of coal in the United States. They reported that the average price per ton at the mouth of the mines for all coal mined in the State of Illinois was $1.11; in Indiana, $1.08; in Pennsylvania, $1.01; in Ohio, $1.03; and in West Virginia, 90 cents. What possible excuse can be given for raising those prices to $3 at the mouth of the mine, or to $4 or $5, as the Senator has shown from some of the letters which he has read has been done, is incomprehensible to me. It indicates a greed that ought to be punished. For that reason I am in favor of this bill, in the hope that, if nothing else will do so, the mere statement that the Government will prosecute those who unduly enhance prices will have a tendency to lower the price which unscrupulous operators are attempting to extort for coal with such enormous profit to themselves. It seems to me the objections raised to the President being vested with the power sought to be given to him, when, as a matter of fact, for the protection of the Government and of the people, it is essential in times of war that such power should be reposed in him, are not valid or well taken.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, there is an excuse for all of this. Why, these operators told us before the Interstate Commerce Committee that it was the "human element" in them that compelled them to raise the prices! We have an able Medical Corps in the Army and in the Navy, and I hope they may be persuaded to operate upon some of these coal operators so as to relieve them of some part of this "human element," or at least to relieve them from the management of these mines, if it becomes necessary, in the hope that they may recover from this frightful disease—"human element."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that this bill will have a tendency to cure that disease to some extent?

Mr. POMERENE. Why, they are running to cover now, simply because of the fact that these bills are pending here.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the Senator has given a great deal of study to this problem. I think that second only to the food problem itself, the fuel situation is the most important that the Senate can possibly consider.

The people of this country to-day, Mr. President, are very much exercised because of the fact that those in charge of our food supply have increased prices abnormally. The same thing holds good of the clothing which the people wear—in fact, of everything that the ordinary man uses—but the prices of coal and the supply of coal are so out of all proportion to the conditions that it warrants the Senate giving it the most careful consideration.

What I have been most fearful about is that, perhaps, next winter in some of the crowded sections of the country we shall have no coal at all. To-day in New York City factory owners, men who use bituminous coal, are asked to pay as high as $7 a ton for it. Men who made contracts years ago can not have their contracts filled, but are compelled to go out into the open market and buy coal.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator, because of his great study of the subject, if he is ready to do so now, to address the Senate on the remedy for the situation. I have in mind the fact, if he will permit me a moment further, that to-day the municipalities of our land control the price of water; the States, through their public-service commissions, control the price of gas and electricity; the Nation, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, controls the cost of transportation. I submit, Mr. President, that there is no commodity more important to the business man and to the ordinary everyday man than fuel.

I had something to do with the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission on this subject. Their last report was the result of a resolution adopted by the Senate at my suggestion. They make a radical suggestion for remedying the situation, and I should like the Senator to advise us how he feels about that or whether we ought to go as far as that commission recommends. I am prepared to go pretty far.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my recommendation is contained in Senate joint resolution 77, which I have filed here. I hope the committee having charge of this bill may see their way clear to accept some of its more specific provisions.

I want to go on a little further with this question of prices, because I do not want anybody to think that we have picked up a few high prices here and there. They prevail generally throughout the country.

The mayor of my home city writes me that Goshen run-of-mine coal in 1912 was $1.05 per ton, with 40 cents freight rate to Canton; 1913, $1.10; 1914, $1.15; 1915, $1.15 to $1.20; 1916, $1.30 per ton. In the same period of time No. 8 run of mine ranged in price from 90 cents to $1.20 per ton f. o. b. mines. In the present year Goshen run of mine is selling for from $4.25 to $4.50 per ton f. o. b. mines, Goshen lump coal at $4.50, and No. 8—that is, the Pennsylvania coal—at $4.50.

A prominent manufacturer of my home city writes in the same way. He used to pay for the coal, during the year 1916, $1.30 for run of mine, $1.40 for lump, and had to pay the freight of 40 cents per ton, so that that made it $1.70 and $1.80. In April of this year the operators advanced the price 25 cents per ton, which he was told was the price the miners got, and all coal contracts are based on the advance or decline of the miners' prices. Then he adds:

They could not keep us supplied regularly, and for several months gave us none at all on account of the shortage of cars—and then the embargo; so we had to buy about 1,000 tons, at an average price of $4.55 to $6 per ton for run of mine, and $2.25 to $5 per ton for slack.

That is their statement—

On the subject of the cost of coke, a manufacturer at Barberton, Ohio, writes as follows:

Do not forget coke.

I now quote exactly:

Coke, which sold for $1.50 per ton in normal times, has been boosted all the way up to $15. The situation for us is very serious, as we consume 150 tons daily.

The other day I received a letter from a prominent lawyer of Iowa, Mr. M. F. Healy, who, I understand, is a very high-class man. He speaks of the difficulties with which they are contending; and, without taking the time to read all of this letter, I want to read just a paragraph:

I know of several other instances within the last year of refusals to furnish coal according to written contracts.

These coal companies attempted to take advantage of one contract they had because they were having a strike and did not need their coal; and as some of the public institutions of the city needed coal, they sold a few tons of this coal to them, and the operators tried to avoid the contract because of that fact.

Prices were arbitrarily raised in this community last winter from $5 to $6.50, and from $6 and $6.50 to $9.50 for better qualities of coal.

The whole letter is a very interesting one, but I shall not take the time to refer to it at greater length.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I merely wanted to indorse what the Senator said concerning Mr. Healy. That letter is from my home town, and I know the incident to which he refers. Mr. Healy is a very high-class public-spirited citizen.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate briefly to the effect of these increased prices.

In Ohio and elsewhere the rates for passengers on interurban lines are fixed by ordinance or by the public-utilities commission. Fixed prices have prevailed for many years. The cost of coal to these companies has become so enormous that they tell me they are about to ask for an increase of rates upon the electric lines. I have quite a number of letters from writers who say that they are stockholders in the General Gas & Electric Co., one of the large companies with which Senators generally are familiar. I am told in these letters that for a period of five years dividends have been paid regularly; that their gross earnings are greater to-day than they were last year; and yet they have been compelled to pass their dividends this year because of the increased price of fuel; and we are getting to a point where the price of coal is affecting every industry in the country.

A large manufacturing firm in Toledo says, under date of June 27, that they have recently received coal for which they paid $7 a ton, whereas the price charged them before the war was $3.60.

I have here another letter from a member of the Ohio General Assembly quoting prices of coal in 1916 and 1917. Without reading them I ask to insert them in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Retailers buy principally Jefferson County coal.
Freight, 40 cents and 50 cents.
Delivery charge for hauling to customers, $0.75.
Retailers add a profit of about $1.30.
Prices to customers since September, 1916, as follows:

1916—September, $2.90 to $3.10; October, $3.50 to $3.40, $4, $4.50; November, $5 to $4; December, $5 to $5.50, $6.

1917—January, $6.50 to $5.75, $6; February, $5.75 to $6; March, $5.50 to $5.75; April, $5; May, $5.50 to $6, $6.25; June, $6.50.

Prices paid by retailers to operators at mines:

1916—September, $1.35 to $2.30; October, $1.65 to $3.50; November, $3 to $3.50; December, $3.50 to $4.

1917—January, $4 to $4.50; February, $4; March, $3.50 to $3; April, $3 to $3.75; May, $4.25 to $4.75; June, $4.50 to $4.75.

Mr. POMERENE. I also have a letter from the attorney general of the State of Ohio giving the prevailing prices charged consumers over the State for domestic coal. He gives the prices in 27 different localities. I ask to introduce this letter without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

STATE OF OHIO,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Columbus, July 1, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have made a survey of the prices charged for domestic coal to the consumer over the State of Ohio.

The prices prevailing are as follows:

	Lump.	Egg and nut.
Sabina	$8.50	$7.00
Dayton	$7.00–9.00	$7.00–9.00
Milford	7.00–7.50	7.00–7.50
Spencerville	7.50	7.50
Marion	5.75	9.00
Hamilton	7.25	7.25
Massillon	7.00	7.00
Delaware	6.50	6.50
Crestline	6.75	6.25
Troy	7.00	7.00
Mechanicsburg	7.00	7.00
Warren	7.50	7.50
Vermilion	8.00–9.50	8.00–9.50
Napoleon	8.75	8.75
Columbiana	6.50–7.50	6.50–7.50
Tiffin	7.00	7.00
Painesville	7.50–8.50	9.00
Cambridge (mining district)	4.00	4.00
Barberton	7.00	7.00
Oak Harbor	7.00–7.50	8.00
Middletown	6.00	7.00
Elyria	9.00	8.50
Greenville	8.00–8.25	8.00–8.25
Wellsville	5.25	5.25
Washington Court House	6.50–7.00	6.50–7.00
Bucyrus	7.50–7.75	7.50–7.75
Gallipolis	5.00	5.00
Lima	8.00	8.00

These prices are for soft coal; hard coal much higher. Normal price, $4 to $4.50 per ton.

Sincerely, yours, JOSEPH MCGHEE.

Mr. POMERENE. As indicating the profits which are being earned by some of the large companies, a correspondent sends me a prospectus issued by the Bird Coal & Iron Co. They have offices at 206 South Wabash Avenue, Chicago. I want to read just a paragraph from this letter. The writer is soliciting stock subscriptions, and he says to the addressee:

Having purchased foundry iron for as low as $12 or $13 a ton during the past 12 months, you know that there must be a tremendous profit in it at the present market price of approximately $40 a ton. On a production of 6,000 tons a month, the capacity of our furnace, which will be ready to go in blast within six or eight weeks, you can easily figure what the profits will be when we can produce the iron for approximately $10 a ton and sell it at $40 a ton. A profit of $150,000 a month is well within reason, and on a capitalization of $1,100,000 will be in excess of 100 per cent profit on the entire issue of the common stock of $1,000,000.

Those profits are almost equal to the coal profits.

Mr. President, I could go on for several hours giving similar price quotations throughout the country, but I do not propose to do it. I want to say a word or two further, however, as bearing upon this subject generally.

I gave some quotations of coal prices in the city of Cleveland. The commissioner of heat and light of the city of Cleveland was before our committee the other day. They have a heating plant, an electric-light plant, and a water plant in Cleveland. The prices of coal have become so exorbitant that if they continue the city will be obliged to charge increased prices for light, for water, and for heat, all because of these prices of coal. There is consumed annually in the city of Cleveland 6,000,000 tons of coal. One of the coal operators who appeared before our committee, and who is connected with the committee that has charge of coal, appointed for that very purpose by the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, said in substance that he thought the operators ought to have a profit of $1 per ton on coal during the war. That means, if you please, the city of Cleveland alone will have to pay $6,000,000 profit to these coal operators if present conditions are to prevail. There is consumed in the United States of America annually 600,000,000 tons. At a profit of $1 per ton, the annual profits of the coal operators and dealers in this country would amount to $600,000,000.

Is the Congress going to submit to this situation? I dare say that during the last six months profits have been paid to coal operators and coal dealers, between the moment the coal leaves the mine and the moment it gets to the consumer, of twice $1 per ton. If that be true, then the profits of the coal barons, at the rate of $2 per ton, would amount to $1,200,000,000 per year. And yet one of the excuses that the coal operators give for these high prices is this: "We have played in hard luck for several years. We ought to be permitted to recoup our losses covering a period of years gone by."

Let me say on that subject, briefly, that it is true that certain coal operators in Ohio and elsewhere have lost some money, or at least have not made any, during the last seven years; but there are many other business men in this country who have not made money, and their failure to make money is in large part due to the fact that they got hold of properties that were not paying investments. They made a misadventure. Now they want the public to pay them for their poor investment. It is not fair to say that the coal operators generally throughout the country have not been making money during the last few years; and now, in the State of Ohio, where we have for so many years boasted of our cheap coal, in West Virginia and in western Pennsylvania, all of our people are paying tribute to these operators and dealers.

I am not willing that all the great manufacturing industries of my State, that all of the 1,000,000 families in that State shall be compelled to pay tribute to this great extent to the coal interests of the country. Let me suggest to Senators that coal is much more easily controlled and managed than foodstuffs or most other necessaries for the reason that in the hills of the country the God of nature has planted an unlimited amount of coal. It is there to be taken out. There is no limit to the supply, as there might be in foodstuffs; and it can be handled with very much less difficulty than any of these other articles, important though they are.

We are objecting to-day because American shipping interests are being submarined at sea. I am not willing that the coal operators and coal dealers shall continue to submarine all the manufacturing interests of my own State or of the country. I am not willing that the 1,000,000 families in my own State or the 20,000,000 families in the United States shall continue to pay these extortionate prices, and this Congress can not defend itself before the people of America unless it gives them some relief.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator a question, if I may.

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Both the Senator from Ohio and the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] are members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which took the testimony on this coal question. Does the Senator from Ohio agree to the deduction drawn by the Senator from Iowa, who stated to the Senate the other day that the high price of coal was caused by the fact that the public were running forward clamoring for coal and bidding against each other?

Mr. POMERENE. I am not quite sure that I heard the statement made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is my recollection of his statement.

Mr. POMERENE. It is true, however, that that claim has been made before the committee, and I think it fair to say that the advances are in part due to the fact that there has been some uncertainty in the minds of the consumers. They have been afraid that they would not be able to get their supply of coal in the future, because the mine operators have not in many instances carried out their contracts, and as an extra precaution they have gone out to the mines and have bid against one another. But my contention is that when the situation is such in the country that these exorbitant prices are being charged and paid, and the entire country is suffering as a consequence, whether the high bidding has been due to hysteria, as has sometimes been said, or not, the Government can not permit this condition to prevail and allow the operators and coal dealers to charge these prices.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is the Senator prepared to state what his own opinion is upon the testimony that was given before the committee of which he is a member as to whether there was any concerted or organized holdup or agreement among the coal operators to withhold coal or to force up the price?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think the Senator heard what I said earlier in my remarks. This situation does prevail in certain localities. Cars have been loaded, they have been left on the sidetrack, and they have been kept there until the prices of coal would advance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I heard those statements, Mr. President, but that may be attributed to the local consignee.

Mr. POMERENE. That may be true.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wondered whether the Senator had formed a definite opinion from all the evidence he heard that there was or was not a holdup on the part of coal miners or operators.

Mr. POMERENE. As to a part of the coal operators, I have no question about it. Let me tell you the condition in Pittsburgh to-day. The coal operators have some sort of a bureau or office. They have a secretary employed. Each operator each day mails to the secretary a statement of his output for the day and of the price he is receiving for it, and when the reports come in from all the operators a statement is sent back to each of them giving the amount of the output of each operator in the district and the price he is receiving for it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator pardon me just a moment until I finish this statement? They claim, of course, that if prices are falling it may be a benefit to the consumer if the operators have this knowledge and act upon it, but the fact is that prices have been advancing all the while.

Necessarily, if I should be one of the men who is engaged as an operator and I saw that a dozen other operators in this association were selling a given amount of coal and that they were getting a little bit more than I was getting, the "human element," as they desire to call it, would suggest that I advance my prices as well. The same situation exists in southeastern Ohio.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And in Michigan, too.

Mr. POMERENE. The senior Senator from Michigan tells me that the same condition prevails in his State.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I promised to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Inasmuch as the Senator is answering my question, I merely wish to make one observation. I wondered if these facts are established in testimony by responsible witnesses before the Senator's committee whether the testimony has been laid before the Department of Justice for the consideration of that department.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand it to be so. I desire to say in answering the Senator that a portion of the information I have here has not been laid before the committee. One of the largest manufacturers in Ohio did not see his way clear to give his consent to disclose his name, because he felt he would be boycotted. I know that situation prevails in certain localities. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The last question of the Senator from Connecticut almost anticipated the question I was about to ask the Senator from Ohio. It has seemed to me, after the description the Senator has been giving of the coal situation, that it is one that showed a violation of the Sherman antitrust law, and I was wondering if the Department of Justice had been giving the mater any consideration or, if it had considered it, whether they were of opinion that the men in all the cases the Senator has mentioned were not liable under the penal provisions of the trust law.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. I feel that I can say without impropriety that there has been some investigation. I do not care to say anything further than that at the present time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Indiana had risen first, and I yield to him.

Mr. NEW. The soft-coal situation in Indiana has been attracting as much attention there as in any other of the soft-coal producing States, and the conditions there are about as the Senator from Ohio has described them as existing in his State, and as they have been described by other Senators as existing in the States they represent.

In this connection I have here a letter from the governor of Indiana, written to the President a short time ago, which I should like to have read into the RECORD, with the approval of the Senator from Ohio, as descriptive of the conditions there.

Mr. POMERENE. I would be very glad to have the letter read into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., June 15, 1917.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I do not want to add to your burdens at this time, and yet I feel that the soft-coal situation in this country is one that calls for the immediate consideration of the Federal Government.

Through the public-service commission and the State board of accounts of this State we have caused to be made a careful investigation of the coal situation in Indiana, and have ascertained the cost of mining and the selling price by the operators to their various customers, both on what is known as contract and free coal.

This examination discloses the fact that the cost of mining coal in this State, including all overhead, interest on investment, and a depletion fund for the removal of the coal, is less than $1.50 a ton. It discloses, further, that at a time in the year when the motive power of the railroads is twice as efficient as it will be next winter, and at a time when the coal can be mined less easily, they are only running 60 per cent of the time; that they are charging for free coal at the mines $2.50 to $3 per ton for slack, which price is running considerably higher for mine run, nut, and domestic coal.

The investigation discloses the further fact that labor is not as efficient as it should be, and there is not that close cooperation and sympathy between the miners and the operators, partially due to the fact that the miners realize the enormous profits made by the operators, and do not give their sympathetic cooperation on that account, and the further fact that they can make sufficient money in the short time they work to enable them to get along.

Some things are evident from the examination made: First, we have demonstrated by actual experience that the car-shortage question can be largely taken care of by a closer cooperation with the railroads; second, if a maximum price is fixed for coal, so as to insure the people of this country during the present crisis coal at a price that would afford even liberal profits to the operators, we can secure a closer cooperation with the miners and the operators and a much greater efficiency in that direction; third, with the price fixed, we can conduct a campaign throughout the country urging people to store coal through the summer for use next winter.

As the output of the mines increases the cost now based upon 60 per cent production will rapidly decrease, and if a liberal profit is fixed upon present cost it would result in a very great profit, with the mines operating 90 per cent of maximum.

If this action is not taken and the opportunity that presents itself in the next four months taken advantage of, I believe the country will face a most serious situation next winter, a situation that will cause widespread distress, suffering, and dissatisfaction and seriously embarrass the proper conduct of the war.

Labor is scarce now, but when a million men are taken from the various fields of industry and placed in the Army the shock of this will be immediately felt in the coal industry and everywhere else.

We would have no difficulty in Indiana in bringing the operators to agree to a fair maximum price for bituminous coal were it not for the Federal situation. Indiana coal comes in competition with Illinois, Kentucky, and Ohio coal, and the action by one State, if the price were fixed below that of other States, would simply result in driving our own coal out of the State.

This is essentially a Federal question and ought to be dealt with in that way. I believe that a joint resolution or bill should pass Congress at once authorizing the Federal Government to fix the price of coal, and following that immediate action should be taken to that end.

Assuming that Congress will pass such a law, we ought not to wait for the passage of the law in order to be prepared to act, and I suggest, therefore, that you call to Washington the governors of the soft-coal States east of the Mississippi River with a view of putting on foot a movement to determine at once the cost of producing coal in these various States, and having all the data ready for the commission to be appointed by you for the purpose of fixing prices after Congress acts upon the bill.

I am perfectly willing that the coal operators of this country should make generous profits, but this war calls for a sacrifice upon the part of everyone. As we are asking our young men to offer their lives, we have a right to ask the men of this country who are dealing with such a necessity as coal to make the lesser sacrifice of some share of what might be called their possible profits.

To put it in a different way, we ought to say to them that they shall not be permitted, without any restriction whatever, to exact the last dollar of profit out of the situation in which the country finds itself engaged.

With the assurance that I am ready to support you in every way in this movement and with the kindest personal regards, I am,

Very truly, yours,

JAMES P. GOODRICH,
Governor of Indiana.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether from the testimony gained by his committee he was able to find to what extent the scarcity of cars and the scarcity of labor have caused the present high price of coal?

Mr. POMERENE. I should be very glad to answer that. If you will accept at par the statement of these coal operators who came before the Interstate Commerce Committee, the entire responsibility for the increase in the price of coal is due to the shortage of cars and scarcity of labor and the fact that the people are afflicted with hysteria. But I have had some experience as a practicing lawyer, both in the civil and criminal courts, and I think I can read what is between the lines as well as what is said in the lines. The principal reason—and I say it without any mental reservation whatsoever—the principal reason for the increase of these prices is the rapacity of the people who are selling the coal. Up until the time when this subject was given some publicity here in the halls of Congress all the coal operators were talking about the prices of coal going upward. Now, since legislation is threatened, they are talking about the prices being reduced. It is another case of—

Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it is a fact, and I have heard it asserted many times, that the country has been geographically divided by these coal people and one set of coal men refuse absolutely to sell coal within certain specified districts, then of course the people are left at their mercy, but it is a fact that coal has been stored upon the sidetracks of railroad companies—that cars have been used for storage purposes. I know of instance after instance of such practice myself. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] told us of a situation which existed near Atlanta which ought to cause us to give this matter very careful attention. There is not a shortage in coal. I do not believe the Senator from West Virginia would contend that there is. Last year the West Virginia mines turned out 20,000,000 tons more than the preceding year and nearly 5,000,000 tons more the preceding year than the year before that. It is not the shortage of coal which causes our trouble. And this coal is a part of the eminent domain. It is a part of the common soil. No one could own one acre of this coal without the consent of the Government and the people to whom the soil originally belonged. It is a vastly different situation from that of a manufacturing concern that takes its product from many sources. Coal is a part of the soil and it is a necessity. Our people are very greatly alarmed over the situation which now confronts us, when hospitals and eleemosynary institutions and industrial establishments and private homes are unable to make contracts upon which they can rely for a fuel supply, with the absolute certainty that when winter comes on they will either be bled for additional profits or refused coal.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have enjoyed very much what I have heard of the Senator's address. I regret I could not hear all of it.

I wish to ask the Senator what he thinks of the advice given by the Federal Trade Commission in its report sent to Congress on the 19th of last month, in which it discusses the bituminous-coal situation very fully? The report is printed as House Document No. 193. After showing the enormous increase in the price of coal the report recommends——

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask is that the report on the bituminous-coal situation?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir; on the bituminous-coal situation. The conclusion of the commission is as follows:

In view of the foregoing the commission recommends:

First. That the production and distribution of coal and coke be conducted through a pool in the hands of a Government agency; that the producers of various grades of fuel be paid their full cost of production plus a uniform profit per ton (with due allowance for quality of product and efficiency of service).

Second. That the transportation agencies of the United States, both rail and water, be similarly pooled and operated on Government account, under the direction of the President, and that all such means of transportation be operated as a unit, the owning corporations being paid a just and fair compensation which would cover normal net profit, upkeep, and betterments.

I wish to ask the Senator a question in view of the findings of this report. The object of the pending bill, among other things, is to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of food, fuels, and so forth. Now, does the Senator agree with the Federal Trade Commission in regard to the pooling of coal through a central agency and its distribution through another agency for handling the transportation facilities of the country?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very glad to give the Senator my views on that subject. That may be necessary as a last resort. I do not believe the Government ought to go into private business unless it is necessary for the protection of the people of the country. My thought is that if this legislation is passed and the President is given the power to requisition these mines and property and their equipment the coal people almost immediately will take up the subject themselves and give to us reasonable prices. When they realize that conditions have gotten to such a stage where the people and Congress will not submit, I am sure that the most of them will say, by their act at least, "We have gone too far; we will retrace our steps." They might do it without legislation.

But as I study the situation I find that each day they have been reaching out for higher prices until legislation is threatened. I want this legislation to be passed in order that the President may have the power to use it if it becomes necessary. I do not believe the President will be required to go very much further, but if it becomes necessary that we take over the entire coal product of the country—I say necessary for the well-being of our people in order that we may win this war—I am willing the Government should take the coal mines and operate them. I say this because our people can neither be happy nor efficient if present conditions prevail. To relieve these conditions will aid in winning the war.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have not finished my question. I asked the Senator, Will his plan suffice without any interference whatever in regard to the transportation facilities, and is not the transportation of coal, perhaps, more important in getting it to the ultimate consumer than the mere taking of the coal out of the mine?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. How would you handle that transportation problem? The Senator is aware, of course, that there is said to be a very great shortage of cars. I am not stating that the railroads have not done the best they could, but there is undoubtedly a great shortage of cars in the country, not only in the movement of coal but in the movement of every other kind of freight. What would the Senator suggest to correct that situation?

Mr. POMERENE. I have just said that if I accept the judgment of the coal operators they would place the entire blame upon car shortage and the hysteria of the people. There has been some car shortage, but, comparatively, not to any very great extent.

I have shown, and, I think, conclusively, in my argument to-day, as it was shown by a cross-examination of the coal operators themselves, that there was more coal produced and more coal hauled during the first six months of this year than in the last year or the year before, and they were not speaking about car shortage then. Congress has already given to the Interstate Commerce Commission plenary power when it comes to the control of the question of car supply and car service.

By the substitute bill for the Esch bill, which the Congress passed, we gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission full power over "the movement, distribution, exchange, interchange, and return of cars" and if it becomes necessary the Interstate Commerce Commission can make an order on the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. to-day to send any number of cars from Harrisburg to Pittsburgh or elsewhere to accommodate shippers. More than that, the legislation which is now, I think, in conference gives to the President the power of preferential shipment, and if it becomes necessary to apply more of these cars to coal transportation the President has that power. And more than that, the railroads themselves say that they have already given contracts for 100,000 freight cars and they are awaiting the output of these cars by the car builders.

A statement which I referred to here earlier in the discussion was to the effect that if the railroads would improve their own service with a car supply now 2,700,000 plus, they could increase their present efficiency by an equivalent of about 700,000 cars plus. The car-shortage question does not trouble me very much.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator must be aware that a car shortage was reported recently of 145,000 cars.

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think it would take a good while to get the 100,000 cars which the Senator says the railroads are about to build. In view of all this, I wish to remind the Senator that there is a very serious freight congestion throughout the country. It is not only the coal people who experience a great shortage, but the wheat millers testified before the Agricultural Committee a few days ago that the shortage and high price of wheat was more a question of transportation than anything else. There are great complaints of car shortage everywhere. In Louisiana there is a big sawmill which recently had 95,000,000 feet of lumber on hand in the yard and could not get it taken away because no cars were available.

It seems to me this question of transportation ought to be very carefully considered. In view of its seriousness, does the Senator not think that we ought to utilize not only the railroads of the country to the fullest capacity, but also the waterways?

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator excuse me from taking up the waterways question? I am afraid the Senator would not let me finish my speech.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am merely asking a question and have no desire to interrupt the Senator's speech. I simply wish to know from the Senator whether or not he thinks that the great waterways which were created by the Almighty and utilized by mankind for thousands of years before there were any railroads—for we did not have railroads until about 100 years ago—should not be used now, and why should not the improvement of waterways be encouraged?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We have had the river and harbor question up here for many, many years. We had it last year and the year before, when there were sufficient cars for all purposes of government. We have it now, of course, and of course it has something to do with the question. I hope the great rivers of the country will be improved and made navigable for the freight and passenger boats of the country, but that is a thing which is in the future. I will join with the Senator in the improvement of the great rivers, but I will not join now in the spending of large amounts of money on some of the rivulets and creeks of the country.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then the Senator does not agree with the Federal Trade Commission, which strongly advocates utilization of our water transportation, as well as our rail, through Government agency.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator did not so understand me at all, because I said as to these great waterways I am in sympathy with the movement.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand, but I ask the Senator if he believes in this advice of the Federal Trade Commission, which says the situation is so bad that the only solution of it is for the Government, through one agency, to pool all the transportation facilities, both rail and water. Does the Senator from Ohio think that is wise, and have we reached that serious point yet?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I realize that our railway system can be improved and that our waterway system can be improved, but our coal situation can be improved without waiting for either or both of those. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is probably true, and I sincerely hope it can be.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POMERENE. I promised to yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

APPENDIX.

The following statement of carloads of bituminous coal that originated on 53 railroads, and of beehive coke on 11 roads, in January, 1917, is compiled from report received by the Geological Survey, Department of the Interior, by noon, February 15, 1917:

Comparative figures based on reports for January, 1917.

	January, 1917.	December, 1916.	January, 1916.
Number of working days	26	25	25
Carloads of bituminous coal, Pennsylvania (15 roads)	188,161	173,914	204,417
West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland, and Ohio (11 roads)	200,560	188,751	190,440
Illinois and Indiana (13 roads)	43,475	128,891	137,327
Kentucky and Alabama (6 roads)	18,930	17,152	15,471
Iowa, Texas, Colorado, and Southwestern States (8 roads)	22,590	20,197	79,900
53 roads	573,716	528,905	567,555
Carloads of beehive coke (11 roads)	64,669	62,952	69,902

The increase in shipments of bituminous coal in January, 1917, compared with December, 1916, was 8.5 per cent, and compared with January, 1916, was 1.1 per cent. The average number of cars of coal per working day was 22,062 in January, 1917, against 21,152 in December, 1916, and 22,701 cars in January, 1916. These statistics indicate that although shipments in January, 1917, were greater than in December, 1916, in all the five States or groups of States, and were greater than in January, 1916, in all the groups shown, except Pennsylvania, the average daily rate of production is now less than a year ago, but is above that for December, 1916, which in turn was below that for November, 1916.

The shipments of beehive coke in January, 1917, showed an increase of 2.7 per cent compared with December, 1916, and a decrease of 8 per cent compared with January, 1916.

The following statement of carloads of bituminous coal that originated on 58 railroads and of beehive coke on 14 roads in February, 1917, is compiled from reports received by the Geological Survey, Department of the Interior, by noon, March 15, 1917:

Comparative figures based on reports for February, 1917.

	February, 1917.	January, 1917.	February, 1916.
Number of working days	23	26	24
Carloads of bituminous coal, Pennsylvania (13 roads)	148,290	179,974	183,695
West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland, and Ohio (10 roads)	164,062	199,610	185,501
Illinois and Indiana (16 roads)	144,522	164,179	148,771
Kentucky and Alabama (6 roads)	38,785	42,698	33,387
Iowa, Texas, Colorado, and Utah, and Southwestern States (13 roads)	45,557	53,655	46,080
58 roads	541,216	640,116	597,434
Carloads of beehive coke (14 roads)	58,450	72,110	73,124

The decrease in shipments of bituminous coal in February, 1917, compared with January, 1917, was 15.5 per cent, and compared with February, 1916, was 9.4 per cent. The average number of cars of coal per working day was 23,531 in February, 1917, against 24,620 in January, 1917, and 24,893 in February, 1916. The shipments in February were less than in January, which was to be expected because of the fewer working days. These statistics indicate that, except in Kentucky and Alabama, the daily rate of production was lower in February than in January, 1917, and considerably less than in February, 1916. The average daily loading on 23 roads in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland, and Ohio was 7 per cent less in February than in January, 1917, and on 13 roads west of the Mississippi was 19 per cent less.

The shipments of beehive coke in February, 1917, showed a decrease of 18.9 per cent compared with January, 1917, and a decrease of 20.1 per cent compared with February, 1916.

The following statement of carloads of bituminous coal that originated on 55 railroads and of beehive coke on 10 roads in March, 1917, is compiled from reports received by the Geological Survey, Department of the Interior, by noon, April 16, 1917.

Comparative figures based on reports for March, 1917.

	March, 1917.	February, 1917.	March, 1916.
Number of working days	27	23	27
Carloads of bituminous coal:
Pennsylvania (13 roads)	191,142	148,290	185,307
West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland, and Ohio (9 roads)	148,557	123,209	137,985
Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan (16 roads)	152,389	144,995	131,435
Kentucky, Alabama, Iowa, and Southwestern States (11 roads)	25,445	25,321	24,028
Rocky Mountain States (6 roads)	13,547	13,979	9,548
55 roads	531,080	455,794	488,303
Carloads of beehive coke (10 roads)	68,125	50,354	75,689

The increase in shipments of bituminous coal in March, 1917, compared with February, 1917, was 16.5 per cent, and compared with March, 1916, was 8.8 per cent. The average number of cars of coal per working day was 19,669 in March, 1917, against 19,817 in February, 1917, and 18,085 in March, 1916. The increase in March over February, 1917, was due to the greater number of working days. On all the groups of roads shown more cars of coal were loaded in March, 1917, than in March, 1916, which had the same number of working days. An improvement in the car supply in the East is indicated by the increase of 6 per cent in the average daily loading on 22 roads in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland, and Ohio, in March over February. The average daily loading on 16 roads in Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan decreased 10 per cent and on 17 other roads 15 per cent.

The shipments of beehive coke in March, 1917, showed an increase of 35.3 per cent compared with February, 1917, and a decrease of 10 per cent compared with March, 1916.

The following statement of carloads of bituminous coal that originated on 85 railroads and of beehive coke on 13 roads in April, 1917, is compiled from reports received by the Geological Survey, Department of the Interior, by noon, May 15, 1917.

Comparative figures based on reports for April, 1917.

	April, 1917.	March, 1917	April, 1916.
Number of working days	25	27	25
Carloads of bituminous coal originating mainly in the following districts: Central Pennsylvania, Maryland, and New River and Pocahontas fields of West Virginia and Virginia (11 roads)	170,548	185,628	157,255
Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan (14 roads)	111,901	116,914	72,763
Eastern Kentucky and West Virginia (except New River and Pocahontas fields) (11 roads)	150,684	165,085	147,630
Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia (5 roads)	14,066	16,499	13,818
Illinois, Indiana, and Western Kentucky (22 roads)	138,300	167,623	62,166
Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, and Texas (12 roads)	46,782	57,820	36,585
Rocky Mountain States, North Dakota, and Washington (10 roads)	27,556	30,274	18,760
85 roads	659,837	739,843	508,982
Carloads of beehive coke (13 roads)	53,244	54,524	49,597

The decrease in these shipments of bituminous coal in April, 1917, compared with March, 1917, was 11 per cent. The shipments in April, 1917, were 30 per cent greater than in April, 1916. The average number of cars of coal loaded per working day on the 85 roads was 26,393 in April, 1917, a decrease of 3.7 per cent from March, 1917, and an increase of nearly 30 per cent over April, 1916. The daily average of cars loaded in March, 1917, was 27,400, and in April, 1916, 20,359. The daily average loading in April, 1917, in all the districts mentioned, except western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan, was less than in March, 1917.

The shipments of beehive coke in April, 1917, showed a decrease of 2.3 per cent compared with March, 1917, and an increase of 7.3 per cent compared with April, 1916.

The following statement of carloads of bituminous coal that originated on 82 railroads and of beehive coke on 16 roads in May, 1917, is compiled from reports received by the Geological Survey, Department of the Interior, by noon, June 15, 1917:

Comparative figures based on reports for May, 1917.

	May, 1917.	April, 1917.	May, 1916.
Number of working days	26	25	26
Carloads of bituminous coal originating mainly in the following districts: Central Pennsylvania, Maryland, and New River and Pocahontas fields of West Virginia and Virginia (11 roads)	186,249	170,560	173,190
Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan (12 roads)	113,463	107,374	87,289
Eastern Kentucky and West Virginia (except New River and Pocahontas fields) (11 roads)	173,101	153,406	173,258
Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia (5 roads)	13,287	12,168	12,371
Illinois, Indiana, and western Kentucky (20 roads)	162,104	135,532	84,865
Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, and Texas (12 roads)	50,320	41,158	37,584
Rocky Mountain States, North Dakota, and Washington (11 roads)	41,150	37,611	28,930
82 roads	739,674	657,809	597,517
Carloads of beehive coke (16 roads)	75,528	72,222	76,095

The increase in these shipments of bituminous coal in May, 1917, compared with April, 1917, was 12.4 per cent, and compared with May, 1916, was 23.8 per cent. The average number of cars loaded per working day on the 82 roads was 28,449 in May, 1917, an increase of 8.1 per cent over April, 1917, and of 23.8 per cent over May, 1916. The daily average of cars loaded in May, 1917, was 28,449, compared with 26,312 in April, 1917, and 22,981 in May, 1916. The daily average loading in May, 1917, in all districts mentioned was greater than in April, 1917, and, except in eastern Kentucky and part of West Virginia, was greater than in May, 1916.

The shipments of beehive coke in May, 1917, showed an increase of 4.6 per cent compared with April, 1917, and a decrease of 0.75 per cent compared with May, 1916.

Mr. HUSTING subsequently said: The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] discussed Senate joint resolution 77. I desire to present a letter addressed to me from Frederick W. Walker, of Cedarburg, Wis., dealing with the same question. I ask that it be printed in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The letter referred to is as follows:

MILWAUKEE NORTHERN RAILWAY CO.,
Cedarburg, Wis., June 20, 1917.

Hon. PAUL O. HUSTING,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to call to your attention bill H. R. 4125, introduced in the House of Representatives on May 3 by Mr. LEVER, and particularly to sections 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 of this bill, covering the regulation by the Government of coal and the production and distribution of same.

In to-day's papers, under a dispatch from Washington dated June 18, it is reported that Secretary Daniels has ordered the mines to begin at once the shipment of coal at a tentative price of $2.33 at the mines, pending a report of the Federal Trade Commission on the cost of mining, etc. If this price of $2.33 is too high it is to be adjusted in accordance with the finding of the Federal Trade Commission as to what is a reasonable price.

At the same time that the Government is purchasing this coal at $2.33 the mine operators are asking the Milwaukee Northern Railway $5 a ton at the mine for this same coal. If it is required to pay such an exorbitant price it must necessarily increase its rates in order to earn the money necessary to purchase same. The coal operators themselves, and the coal dock operators in particular, frankly admit that $3 per ton would be exceedingly high and return a very handsome profit to the coal operators.

You have probably noticed bill S. 2263, introduced May 11, 1917, by Mr. GORE by request. This bill pulls the teeth out of bill H. R. 4125, which it resembles in title and if substituted for H. R. 4125 would tie the Government's hands so completely that no practical results could be obtained.

The fuel situation in this section of the country is more acute and important than foodstuffs. Crops are coming along well and large areas have been planted, so that unless the season is so unfavorable that it produces a crop failure the total yield will be greater than ever before in the history of the State. This, I believe, is also true of the other States throughout the Middle West and Northwest.

It is necessary for this company to have some West Virginia coal for use in its gas producers. Without this grade of coal, which must be of the smokeless or semismokeless type, it is impossible to operate the down-draft type of producer which is installed in its power plant at Port Washington. At the present time this grade of coal costs between $7.50 and $8 at Port Washington, and on account of embargoes can not be secured all rail even at that figure, but must be purchased from some of the coal-dock operating companies. On account of the high price at the mines these coal-dock companies are not filling their docks, as they feel that the mine price is so exorbitant that the Government will compel a reduction, in which event coal stored at present prices could only be sold to the ultimate consumer at a serious loss. This hesitancy and refusal on the part of the dock companies to store coal on their docks is largely responsible for the small tonnage coming forward over the Lakes, and, as the lake season at best is short, unless this situation is remedied without delay so that the dock companies purchase freely, increasing the volume of coal coming by lake, there will be a shortage of coal in the Northwest during the coming winter, which will raise the price to such a high figure that many individual consumers will be compelled to do without the amount of fuel necessary for their comfort.

Action to be effective must be prompt, as unless it is prompt a coal famine will be inevitable. In my opinion the coal operators are playing for delay in order to hold up the price at the mines during the lake season, well knowing that during the later months of the lake season and the months when navigation on the lakes is closed the demand will exceed the output, and therefore prices can be maintained without difficulty. In fact, one coal operator told me he expected to get $7 to $7.50 per ton at the mine for his coal during the fall and winter months. If the Government is not going to regulate the price of coal, it should so announce without delay and end the present suspense and uncertainty, so that both mine operators and dock operators, as well as the ultimate consumer, will close up the necessary contracts to insure sufficient tonnage being mined, transported by lake, and distributed to prevent a fuel famine,

I desire to apologize for trespassing on your time to the extent of so long a letter, but I feel that the fuel situation is the most serious and critical of all the internal problems with which the Government now has to deal. The food problem is one of concern for our allies and not for citizens of this country. We will all have enough to eat. But unless the present fuel situation is remedied some of our citizens will be unable to keep warm during the coming winter and some of our industries will be shut down for lack of fuel. Pooling and other methods of controlling the output devised and supervised by the mine operators will not relieve the situation and produce beneficial results. A strong commission or branch of the Government with broad powers must exercise the control and regulate the business.

Again apologizing for trespassing on your time, I am,

Yours, truly,

FREDERICK W. WALKER.

P. S.—Since dictating this letter a day or two ago I received a copy of H. R. 4961, Union Calendar 32. This bill, if enacted into law, will remedy the situation and provides the same character of relief that would be secured through H. R. 4125.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I rise simply for the purpose of expressing my gratitude to the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] for his lucid explanation of the existing evil and his very proper castigation of the public enemies. I think, however, the Senator ought to deal rather gently with the patriotic gentlemen who are taking advantage of this, the most extraordinary emergency in the history of the Nation to rob and plunder the people. These plutocratic patriots were much in evidence during the year just past. They were liberal contributors to the payment of the bills for the bands that led the "preparedness" parade and bought the flags that floated in the air, and were otherwise very prominent in those patriotic demonstrations. They bribed the press with their patronage, that inculcated in the sensitive minds of the slow-thinking many the necessity of war. They knew very well that when war should come this "human element" would have an opportunity to assert itself and fill to plethora their lean coffers with ill-gotten gold. This war is largely a matter of their creation. They feel that they should be permitted, I dare say, to exercise a proprietary right over everything pertaining to the war, and I shall not be surprised if the Senator finds in the public press to-morrow criticism of his speech by one of those creatures who fatten on the spoils of war, holding the Senator's able speech up to the public as being "very foolish," "silly," and "stupid," and the Senator himself a very "meddlesome man" for daring to interfere with the carrying out of their little scheme. Notwithstanding all that, I want to assure the Senator that he is doing a great service for the American people; and whether Congress, in pursuance of his suggestion, shall enact laws to correct this evil, the sunlight of publicity which the Senator has turned in upon them, his arraignment of the culprits before the court of public opinion, is going to have a most salutary effect. It is with pleasure that I acknowledge myself under great obligations to the Senator for the splendid service he has rendered the American consumer this afternoon. The Senator has pointed out the evil; there is ample power vested in Congress to correct it, and I trust that the Senate, proceeding along lines within constitutional limitations, may proceed at once to the enactment of a proper measure. Mr. President, I wanted to say this much. I wanted to pay the tribute of my approval to the able and thoughtful effort which the Senator from Ohio has just made.

I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hale	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Harding	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Hollis	New	Smith, S. C.
Brady	Husting	Newlands	Smoot
Brandegee	James	Norris	Sterling
Broussard	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sutherland
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Swanson
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thomas
Colt	Kellogg	Penrose	Thompson
Culberson	Kenyon	Phelan	Tillman
Cummins	King	Poindexter	Trammell
Curtis	Knox	Pomerene	Underwood
Dillingham	La Follette	Ransdell	Vardaman
Fletcher	Lewis	Reed	Warren
France	Lodge	Robinson	Williams
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Shafroth	Wolcott
Gore	McKellar	Sheppard
Gronna	McLean	Sherman

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness, and will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. ROBINSON. My colleague, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], is unavoidably absent.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained on important public business. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is detained on official business, and that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on important public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Senate has devoted many days to a discussion of this bill, which seeks to vest executive authority in the hands of the President to regulate and control the food, feed, and fuel resources of the Nation, to the end that they may most economically serve the necessities of our people during the period of the war, and contribute directly in the most practicable, scientific, and efficient manner to the success of our armies, as well as of our allies. A Macedonian cry comes to us from the four corners of the globe not only for our Army to help save the world for democracy and human liberty but for food and clothing, shot and shell, to overthrow and destroy the last remaining dominant autocratic power which would destroy us in order to perpetuate its autocracy.

The need for the prompt enactment of this legislation is imminent and pressing. The hour for action has arrived. It is suicidal to falter or hesitate. Senators are talking too much and too long. We are at war, a war waged by our adversary in the most cruel and barbarous manner. Our ships are being sunk on the high seas, our citizens and soldiers are being murdered, while Senators delay action upon vital legislation, debating constitutional questions, inhibitions, and limitations of power, as if the Constitution was intended as a shield behind which the enemies of the Republic, at home and abroad, can hide while the Government is destroyed.

I yield to no Senator in my devotion to the Constitution. I have sworn to support it; but I must be permitted to construe it in the light of reason and liberty. I can not believe that the framers intended that the Constitution should be invoked and used as an instrument of death to the Republic. The wise men who framed the organic law knew that it was not perfect and that changed conditions would render it necessary to amend and modify it. Accordingly, a number of amendments have been adopted. When the welfare clause was inserted it gave license and broad power to the lawmaking body, which has been frequently invoked. When Mr. Jefferson consummated the so-called Louisiana Purchase, it was urged that he had no constitutional warrant. He believed that the general good and welfare of the country justified his action, and the people approved it. Mr. Lincoln expended large sums of money during the Civil War without express authority of law or constitutional warrant. He said it was necessary to win the war and preserve the Union, and the people approved. The people will approve our action if it appears to be necessary to win the war and preserve our independence.

The country cries for relief against oppression by food gamblers, speculators, and manipulators, yet we hear a constant wail from some sources because of the extraordinary powers we confer on the President, which are as necessary to the successful prosecution of the war as the Army and the Navy, food, and clothing. With practical unanimity Congress declared war between this Republic and the Imperial German Government and promptly voted billions of dollars with which to prosecute it. We passed the selective-draft bill to raise an army of millions of soldiers. Already the flag of freedom and democracy is seen everywhere we look. The tramp of the American soldier is heard around the world, marching to rendezvous, preparing for war. All this goes on while the Senate gravely debates constitutional limitations and questions of policy and procedure, as if the Republic would be destroyed by the enactment of this essential legislation.

Extraordinary situations demand extraordinary measures, and, while much has been said in debate about the broad authority vested in a so-called food dictator, using the word in the most offensive way, yet it has no terrors for me. In the practical administration of this measure I have no fear that any citizen will be denied any right or the enjoyment of his property or effects, except in so far as may be necessary for the general good of the country, whose welfare and preservation it is the duty of everyone to safeguard to the limit of his ability. In this connection, Mr. President, I quote with approval from the recent remarks of a Member of the House during the discussion of this bill:

> For one I am not afraid of the application of healthy power, equally and humanely administered, to crush and destroy an existing power that is rooted in iniquity and has no longer an excuse to live. I am not afraid of war-time dictatorship to help and to save our people and our Government, but I am deeply apprehensive of the continuance of an existing dictatorship, which by manipulation and jugglery and secret connivance and sinister. cupidity feeds and fattens upon the substance, if not upon the souls, of helpless people. I am not afraid of a so-called food dictatorship, counseled by the best loved and most trusted of all Americans who now presides in large measure over the destiny of this Nation, Woodrow Wilson, who has no ambition to lure him and no inducement to oppress. But, sir, I shiver at the possibility of a dictatorship directed by the morals and inspired by the conscience of that "imperial impersonation of blood and murder" called William the Second.

If we are to win this titanic struggle there must be a guiding hand; unlimited and unusual power must be conferred on the Commander in Chief, to whom we must look for victory. We must implicitly trust him. If we undertake to divide the management and conduct of the war between the President and Congress, if we do not give the President a free hand to direct the prosecution of the war, a fatal mistake will be made, from the effect of which we may not recover. If we and our allies do not win we will have no Constitution to defend. Our liberty will be lost, and we will have the rule of kings and emperors instead of a free Republic.

Mr. President, perhaps no Member of the Senate feels more keenly than myself the condition that confronts us. Four members of my immediate family are under the colors. They are ready to follow the flag and defend it on the far-flung battle fields of France, and, with Pershing and Sibert, shed their blood, and, if need be, die that liberty may live. If they should fall on the field or the ship's deck, we will know that they gave their lives that their country might survive. If they live to bring the flag home, we will welcome them as patriots who were willing to die for their country.

Senators, look! That speck out there on the ocean is our flag—the Stars and Stripes, the emblem of liberty. It is going to the battle fields of France; it is carried on our ships and defended by our soldiers. Listen! Do you hear the roar of the guns? Our battleships and our battle cruisers and merchant ships are engaged in a deadly conflict with German submarines. The universal rule of war is to follow the flag, march to the sound of the guns in the absence of other orders. Why stand we here idle? Why debate abstract questions and constitutional limitations when the world is on fire and we have been drawn into the conflagration?

We commandeered our young men, the flower of the land. Our flesh and blood will soon be on the firing line. Who will dare say that we can not commandeer the food, clothing, wheat, and meat, the shot and shell, the necessaries to enable these boys of ours to win a glorious victory with the least possible suffering and sacrifice? Who among you will say that the Constitution prevents us from commandeering everything necessary to prevent suffering at home? Who will say that it is not our duty to exert all of our power, to resort to extraordinary means, constitutional or otherwise, to prevent the distress and suffering that will follow the failure to pass this bill?

The farmers and producers need not and do not fear the effect of this legislation. It is the merciless speculator and conspirator who will feel the lash that will be wielded by the agents of the Government in the enforcement of this wise and beneficent law. I have no patience or respect for these miserable creatures who fatten and grow rich on the suffering and misery of the people engaged in a desperate war, upon the result of which their liberty and future happiness depends. I would vote for a bill to authorize the trial of these food speculators and conspirators by a drumhead court-martial, convict, and hang them without the benefit of clergy. They are a lot of buzzards perched on the dome of the Capitol waiting for the stark carcass of some man, woman, or child over which they can hold a wake, and thank Congress for its failure to act on this measure. Congress should cry out in tones that can be heard from one end of the Republic to the other, "Attention, America; by States, right wheel, guide right, forward, march!" And send a wireless message to the Kaiser that America is coming with millions of men and billions of money; with ships laden with wheat and meat, shot and shell, and every other thing necessary for the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. President, before the sun sets to-day the Senate should vote on this bill. The time for action has come. We are at war. We have crossed the river. The bridges are burned behind us. We have put our hands to the plow. Who among us will dare to look back? If the Imperiol German Government can dictate the terms of peace, what may we expect? If Germany can conquer and take over the fleets of England and France, combined with their own, how long would it be before their guns will be thundering at our seaports, demanding tribute in excess of her losses during the war? It makes me shiver to contemplate a situation like that.

That patriot and soldier, Gen. Pershing, is on the firing line. He has been joined by Maj. Gen. Sibert, one of Alabama's best beloved sons, who commands the advance division of the American Army. They are as anxious, perhaps, as Wellington was at Waterloo, when he awaited the arrival of Blucher and his legions.

Mr. President, we are asked why we sent our Army to France. The answer is it is better to fight on French soil than our own. If Germany can win over the allies, the battle field will be transferred to American soil, and the allies will have been eliminated and the struggle will be left to us.

What will be our compensation? What will be received for our sacrifice of blood and treasure? The answer is: The war is over and the warring nations assemble to arrange the terms for peace; our great President will sit at the head of the table; the terms will be an agreement for disarmament, a severe limitation on naval equipment, and a compact entered into that all future disputes shall be arbitrated, and each will pledge the other for an enforcement of the decree of the high court to agree upon, arbitrate, and settle differences. Then, and not until then, will America be free to pursue her own high ideals of justice and humanity, founded on world democracy. The day is almost here when kings and emperors will give place to republics, founded on liberty and progressive democratic theories and principles, supported by free people everywhere under the sun. God, speed the day.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I fully share the view of the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who has just delivered one of the most eloquent, appropriate, and stirring addresses that it has been my pleasure to hear in the Senate. I should like to see this bill disposed of to-day if that were possible, but I fear that it is not. If it were, I would immediately give way for that purpose. I had not intended to occupy further time in its discussion until this morning, when, upon my return to the city, I found a very large number of letters and telegrams from my State insisting very earnestly, and some of them very arbitrarily, upon my support of what is called the "bone-dry" amendment to the bill. I determined after reading them that the simpler way to answer these requests—although it would perhaps be more appropriate to call them demands—by a brief statement of my views concerning that very important division of the bill.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who attribute to the prohibition element of the country the desire to take advantage of a national crisis as an opportunity for the institution of a great reform. I give them credit for the same spirit of patriotism which I hope they will concede to myself. I think that some of them may be overzealous, but I am sure that all of them believe the measure as it passed the House and was presented to the Senate is in the interest of the public welfare, and, as stated by the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] the other day, an actual measure of conservation.

Mr. President, I am not a prohibitionist; neither do I swing to the opposite extreme. I am a temperance men in the literal sense of the term. I think, therefore, that I can approach the subject in some degree without passion and as an impartial judge of its merits and its expediency.

I voted against prohibition when the constitutional amendment providing for it was adopted in my State in 1914. I announced, however, that if the people adopted that amendment I should regard it as an instruction to support the amendment for national prohibition when it should be considered. I shall act in accordance with that announcement. When the question of national prohibition is duly presented for our consideration I shall vote for it, because a majority of the people whom I in part represent in this Chamber want it, and because it is my duty to comply with their officially declared opinions.

But, Mr. President, I am unable to give my assent to this measure, which is designed to revolutionize a great industry having up to this time the sanction and the protection of the law, and practically to summarily sweep it out of existence by a legislative stroke of the pen. I do not think that at this time it is either wise, expedient, or desirable to do so for many reasons, some of which I shall discuss.

The prohibition movement in America has been a gradual one, accomplishing its objects deliberately. It has succeeded by a process of evolution and has effected momentous changes gradually. I know of no instance in which any State has adopted prohibition designed to take effect eo instanti. On the contrary, provision has been made for the prospective operation of the change, thus affording an interval during the passage of which the business to be abandoned and those engaged in it could adjust themselves to the change and accommodate themselves to the new and different order by disposing of their property and by securing occupation in other directions. That is a wise, just, and statesmanlike method of legislation, especially where great property interests are involved which have been created with the sanction and under the protection of existing law.

Mr. President, when we travel from Washington to our homes or from our homes to Washington we like to travel quickly. The faster the train, consistent with safety, the more appropriate it is to our purposes. But few of us would choose such methods of conveyance if we expected that even accidentally we would arrive in the station at the same speed with which we traversed the country to reach it, since the shock of arrival would inevitably invite destruction both of the train and of its occupants.

Such, however, is the method by which we here propose to deal with prohibition as applied to the manufacture of fermented liquors, because, Mr. President, if we are to prohibit the manufacture of beer by the ipse dixit of legislation, to become at once effective, no legitimate reason can be assigned for the exclusion of wines or any other beverage carrying a perceptible degree of alcohol. The milder beverages for the most part disappear at once. Mr. President, I am unable to give my assent to a measure which is designed to operate in that way.

What will be the effect of it? To answer that question is perhaps to indulge in conjecture. My opinions may or may not be verified by actual results. I may, through the operation of the law, be mistaken in the apprehensions which I entertain. But when I consider that some two and a half billions of dollars are invested in this industry, invested under the sanction of law and Constitution, invested for profitable purposes, which may be entirely destroyed, certainly very seriously diminished, by the enactment of legislation like this at this time or at any other, I ask whether we are doing justice to its owners, whether we are not applying to them a system radically different from that which has characterized similar restrictive legislation in the past, and whether they may not complain and charge with justice that the Government which they are required, as ourselves, to support has deprived them of their property without due process of law.

Moreover, Mr. President, it is a fact—a deplorable fact, if you please, but a fact nevertheless—an unfortunate fact, if you please, but like all other facts a stubborn thing—that in this country are literally millions of our fellow citizens, the most of them workingmen, so accustomed to the use of beer as a beverage, so dependent upon it, especially during the warm months of summer, and particularly in a year like this, when industrial activity is unprecedented, that they should not be immediately deprived of it. What will be the social effect, let me ask, upon a vast body of American citizens educated by habit, however reprehensible, to regard indulgence in their daily beer as a necessity of life, if the Government of the United States should suddenly deprive them of it and make it impossible for them longer to secure it?

I think I hear an answer, perhaps the only one, that the habit being a bad, insanitary one, an unhealthful one, the sooner it is stopped the better; and to that ordinarily I would agree. But it can not be ended in a moment. Many a time in my life I have given some poor devil 25 cents to buy a drink of whisky. I have done it because his shattered nerves, his physical condition, craved and needed the stimulant to which it had long been accustomed and of which it was being immediately deprived. No man can instantly absolve himself from a fixed habit of that sort; and while we may not have had personal experience, we can realize from the observation of its effect upon the individual what its consequence would be upon the mass, and that consequence I do not think we should deliberately invite at this time. It would stir those concerned to revolt.

There is a problem, and a mighty one, of sociology involved in this proposed legislation which may culminate in wide and far-reaching disaster if we seek by prohibitory legislation, to become immediately effective, to cut off the beer supply of the country.

When disease makes a surgical operation necessary his physician sees to it that his bodily condition is so far repaired as to enable him to stand an operation with the knife. Only in the most desperate cases, where the one chance for life is an immediate operation, does the careful and wise surgeon immediately resort to so extreme a remedy.

No one will say that this country is in condition for this proposed legislative operation. Socially and industrially we are in a state of unrest. We are also in a state of war. Between the war and social discontent there is no compatibility. I wish I could say with truth that throughout the length and breadth of this country, in the grave crisis which confronts us, there exists a common sentiment of national unity. I wish I could perceive among the masses of our people, and particularly in the great metropolitan centers of the country, that devotion to the flag and to the institutions which it typifies, that spirit of sacrifice without which the marshaling of our armies and the assembling of our fleets may prove to be vain and useless. It is the man behind the guns and the spirit in the man who is behind the guns upon which depends the result of wars and the fate of nations. That spirit exists in many communities and with many people in America, but that it is not universal is evidenced by the news we read every day in the pages of every daily periodical in the country.

Mr. President, yesterday the people of the United States, in obedience to a national custom, set aside their business cares and met to celebrate the birthday of the Republic. The sentiments expressed at these meetings breathed everywhere the loftiest spirit of self-denial and of devotion. In Minneapolis a high dignitary of the church, in welcoming the Belgium commission, referred to the sufferings and miseries of that unhappy country with an eloquence so piteous and sympathetic that the members of the mission burst into tears and were unable to reply.

The archbishop had touched the hearts of his guests, and they responded in the most eloquent of all human testimonials. They deserve, Mr. President, the eulogies then and elsewhere pronounced upon the country which they represent, its heroic conduct, its sufferings, the slaughter of its people, and the desolation of its fields and factories.

Mr. President, the great indictment against Germany is her autocracy, her cruelty, her frightfulness, her long and awful trail of blood, of destruction, and of murder. From that we turn with horror; yet immediately preceding our Fourth—on the 2d and 3d days of July—in one of the cities of one of the States of this Union, a tragedy of horror and of bloodshed was enacted exhibiting a wanton disregard of the sacredness of life and the sanctity of property equal to the extremes of German frightfulness and resulting in the wanton murder of scores of citizens of the United States, bereft of the poor protection of Organized Militia mobilized for their protection, that rivals in its atrocity many of the hideous experiences of Belgium and of Poland.

I read no word of denunciation of that awful crime on yesterday. I saw very few editorial comments in the papers, filled as they were with patriotic fervor, of sympathy with the sufferings of the little peoples of the Old World, and voicing the pronouncement that this Nation had entered the world-wide conflict that democracy might be made safe and the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property be made secure.

Has it come to pass in this country, Mr. President, that the butchery of a part of our people by the rest of them is so much a national pastime as no longer to provoke more than passing comment, save as attention may be directed to something unusually diabolical in the particular act of slaughter? We have in this country 10,000,000 blacks, one-tenth of our entire population. They were brought here against their will. Their loyalty is undoubted—at this crisis is essential. Can we preserve it, Mr. President, when simply for economic reasons—and there were no other—when simply because of an alleged competition in the struggle for existence the laws are to be set aside, the Constitution ignored, and those sacred rights of which we loudly boast are denied them? Will they fight, can we ask them to fight, for the flag, as they have fought for it, and give their whole devotion to the cause which should be theirs as well as ours when perhaps at home their friends and their dependents are subject to butchery and destruction through the passing whim of the lust of murder, because some element of economic competition may be suggested while they are in the trenches across the sea? Is that the sort of country America is to them and theirs? And if so, can we hope to arouse in them a spark of our own enthusiasm for our institutions, our charter of rights, or our immortal declaration?

No, Mr. President! Nor can we afford at this time to provoke the antagonism of other elements of society, which we will certainly do if, in legislation of this sort, in this war measure we shall suddenly, immediately, practicaly without warning, destroy millions upon millions of property values and create an immediate, far-reaching, and forcible change in the social habits and physical needs of a great proportion of our people.

I do not invoke any constitutional limitation, Mr. President. As a war measure I have little doubt of our authority to take over property required or to prohibit occupations thought to be inimical to the Nation's welfare. But we should not forget that the citizen must be well assured that the need is urgent and the danger great. He justly views the organic act of his country as more essential for his protection in time of war than in the days of peace.

What is this Government for, Mr. President, if it is not to give every man owing allegiance to its flag the protection of its laws?

On yesterday the Speaker of the House, in one of his characteristic addresses, read with emphasis and approval that splendid sentence which constitutes the preamble to the Constitution of the United States:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice—

Burke said a government that did not claim to be founded upon justice labored under the imputation of being no government at all—> insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain—

And so forth.

Mr. President, are we at home establishing justice by proposals like this? Is domestic tranquillity secure in the United States? And if we would survive, must they not be the objects of government at all times and everywhere as persistently as the enactment of all legislation needed to carry it safely through a great war?

The Speaker also said yesterday:

> I now and here state our case in the fewest words possible: No nation will long endure or deserves to endure that does not protect all of its citizens wherever they may be on legitimate business or errand, by land or sea.

Not a part of its citizens, not some of its citizens, but all of them.

That is merely a statement of the eternal truth that a government must protect in the exercise of their natural rights the meanest of its citizens or it has failed in the supreme object for which it was created.

Mr. President, I hold no brief for the race, the recent assault upon whose fundamental rights has served me as a text to emphasize one of the objections which I entertain to the present enactment of the House amendment to this bill. I cast no reflection upon the great State so well represented by my friend the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] in so doing, for unfortunately and unhappily, Mr. President, these terrible occurrences are common to no section of our Union; they characterize no political party or organization. They are the awful symptoms of a deep-seated national disease, having its origin in lack of respect for law and in the laxity of its enforcement.

But I do not want to add to this situation at this time, Mr. President. We must face the foe now whether we will it or not. We are in war and we need our armies at the front. We must have behind us, we ought to have behind us, the undivided loyalty and support of every man, woman, and child in the country, black and white, Jew and Gentile. We are going to draft them all for the front, within the limitations fixed by law. What right has the Government to call upon any man to offer his life and give his time and his services to his country if the flag does not protect him on the field and his family at home? What country can truthfully proclaim itself to be the land of liberty and justice that fails in the recognition and performance of these tremendous duties?

I referred the other day, Mr. President, to an organization called the Industrial Workers of the World, an organized association officered by murderers and assassins, whose only virtue is that they proclaim their devotion to the slaughter of citizens and to the destruction of their property, to the disintegration of society, and to the creation of industrial revolution. They have been allowed to spread all over this country, to proselytize and to propagate their infernal doctrines, and to become a menace through organization and through numbers. It is impossible for such an organization to persist in a country like ours if the country shall itself continue to perform its functions and to discharge its obligations—an organization busy everywhere and at all times in fomenting disorder, in creating trouble, in inspiring strikes, and counseling assassination, repudiated by the legitimate labor organizations everywhere, and now doubtless in league with the common enemy, since present conditions are its opportunity. It will be swift to take advantage of such a profound disturbance as this amendment would create and double their zeal in the cause of social disintegration.

So, Mr. President, in my judgment this is not the time, and this bill should not be the vehicle, for the accomplishment of that change—that mighty and far-reaching social revolution—to be instantly thrust upon the country by its enactment, and for which there can be no immediate or overpowering occasion.

But there is another reason, Mr. President, perhaps a sordid one. I refer to the revenue which we derive from this industry. My recollection is not accurate as to its annual amounts—the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LAFOLLETTE] is better informed than I—but I think it is considerably more than $200,000,000. Mr. President, in these days $200,000,000 is not much, relatively speaking. This body deals in billions, and hundreds of millions are no longer of importance, except as we must raise them; in other words, they are immaterial as items of appropriation but they are of vast consequence as items of assessment.

The Senate Committee on Finance has been in session for a number of weeks, giving practically all of its time to the attempted solution of difficult problems of revenue, and has finally reported a bill which, among other things, includes an increased taxation upon fermented liquors and wines. The enactment of this bill will dispense with a large part of that revenue and require a reconstruction of the bill itself; in other words, the load must be put somewhere else. I do not know where to put it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Colorado think, if the liquor traffic were entirely disposed of, taking into consideration the economy which might be assured or realized in the conservation of human life, and so forth, that we should lose any considerable amount of money? Would we not make up our revenue by what we should save in better citizenship?

Mr. THOMAS. I think so, for the reason that the reform proposed is going to be an immediate and violent one. If we approach it by easy stages, I answer no. Moreover, economic conservation does not replenish the Treasury automatically. We must discover another source of revenue and assess it.

Mr. BORAH. I read a statement a day or two ago about the effect of the limitation of drink, including beer and wine, in England, as to the reduction of crime and so forth, during the last two years. If that statement be correct—and I presume it was correct, because it seemed to be a quotation from a member of the commission which has charge of that subject in England—so far as dollars and cents are concerned, we could very well dispense with the $250,000,000 in the way of taxation.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator whether in Great Britain the manufacture of fermented liquor has been prohibited? My understanding is that it has not been.

Mr. BORAH. It has not been prohibited, but it has been very largely reduced; and in proportion to its reduction has the decrease of crime been realized.

This is a statement—I do not, of course, stand sponsor for it myself—but it was made and published a few days ago, and purported to come from a member of the commission which has charge of the liquor interest and the reduction of the use of liquor in England during the war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the reduction of the consumption of fermented liquors; I am in favor of it largely for reasons which have made prohibition so successful. Those reasons are practical ones; they are efficient ones. The prohibition issue was a moral one for a century and it made but little progress; but when it became an essentially industrial issue, when the practical and material effect and benefit consequent upon the adoption of the principle was apparent, then it made, as it ought to have made, rapid progress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE rose.

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment, and I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. President, my impression is that if Great Britain had dealt with the question as the House has dealt with it, and the British workmen's supply of beer had been suddenly cut off, crime in its various phases would have increased very perceptibly instead of having decreased. What its effect would have been upon social conditions I do not know, but I believe it would have seriously interfered with the successful conduct of the war.

Now I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In connection with the statement by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] as to the report of the British commission on the effect of the reduction of the amount of liquor used in Great Britain, I saw a statement in the press within two days that the discontent in England was so great on that account that they had to substantially increase the amount of brewing allowed.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me, the statement which I had reference to was this:

> The results of this restriction are conclusively shown in the decrease in the number of convictions for drunkenness. In greater London and 36 boroughs of England and Wales, with a population of over a hundred thousand each, there were 118,267 convictions in 1913, and 52,783 in 1916. Of these 98,115 were men, 28,352 were women, in 1913; and 36,711 men and 16,072 women in 1916.

In Glasgow there were 5,863 convictions during the first four weeks in 1915 and 3,153 for the same period in 1917. The deaths due to alcoholism in England and Wales decreased from 1,831 in 1913 to 953 in 1916.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] will allow me, before he enters upon a reply to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I wish to ask him a question. I am informed—I was in the hall in conference—that the Senator from Colorado has made some allusions to matters transpiring in East St. Louis?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I made reference to the subject.

Mr. LEWIS. I am informed that the Senator from Colorado found it agreeable to make some condemnations of matters which, according to the reports in the papers, transpired in East St. Louis. I want to ask the Senator was he making that reference with a view of connecting it with the question of drink or the assumption that beer or drink had entered into the results which he condemns?

Mr. THOMAS. I made the reference, Mr. President, for two reasons: I thought it was the duty of some Senator to speak unsparingly of that unfortunate event while it was fresh in the minds of the people. That was one reason. The other was that it is a terrible example of the condition of unrest in the country, which bodes no good for the prosecution of this war, unrest I do not feel warranted in voting to increase, as I fear it would be increased by the adoption of a so-called "bone-dry" amendment, affecting fermented liquors, going into immediate force, and its effect upon the great army of American beer drinkers.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say to him that I have no personal knowledge of what transpired in East St. Louis, in my State; but I will inform the Senator that I am informed by telegrams that the report which is in the papers is not accurate, and that, while there have been atrocities and outrages and killings, they have been brought forth by circumstances different from those which the public press has informed the country. A request has been made, may I inform the able Senator from Colorado, by the agencies and citizens of East St. Louis for the Federal Government to make an independent investigation, so that the truth may be arrived at and justice may be done to the community, which, I will admit, now stands before the country as more or less impeached for lawlessness and brutality.

I beg the Senator to understand that, from my own personal experience, there is no community with a higher degree of intelligence or a higher degree of lawfulness and a nobler citizenship than that which is represented in the people of East St. Louis.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there can be no excuse in a civilized country like this in any community, and especially such a community as the Senator from Illinois says the people of East St. Louis are, for the horrible outrages which have been recently perpetrated there upon the negro population; and if one-tenth part of what we have read of its horrors is true, it is a disgrace, not more to the people of East St. Louis than to the United States of America. I earnestly hope it will never be repeated.

I stated before the Senator came in that I did not reflect upon the people of Illinois, or any part of them, as the sole offenders; that this last development happened to be in that State; that all the States have in times past similarly offended; and that, so far as the social conditions of the country were concerned, such events indicated very strongly to my mind not only a spirit of lawlessness and discontent by the absence of that oneness of spirit which should now characterize the people of this Nation, if we are to win the mighty struggle upon which we have entered.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield; but I want to say, Mr. President, that I have occupied the floor much longer than I intended because of interruptions.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator from Illinois a question for information?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator from Illinois inform the Senate if East St. Louis is a prohibition city?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have understood that East St. Louis is not in the technical sense a prohibition town in that it has local laws forbidding the drinking or distribution of spirituous liquors; but I can assure the Senator that a very large percentage of its citizens are for prohibition in their own character and are very moral in all their habits.

Mr. GRONNA. Perhaps the Senator did not understand me. Are saloons being conducted and is liquor being sold in saloons in East St. Louis, or is it really a prohibition city?

Mr. LEWIS. I must say to my friend that I have never been in a saloon in East St. Louis, and I can not say whether liquor is bought and sold there from my knowledge, but from reading the public press I admit that liquor may be bought in some places in East St. Louis called saloons.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there are at present serious industrial disturbances in prohibition States. There was one some time ago in my own.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment. The causes which underlie these unfortunate occurrences strike far deeper than the corner saloon. They are found in the discontent with or indifference to the institutions of this country, their requirements, and that sanctity of human life of which we boast, but which unfortunately does not exist. We have in this country high cost of living; but the cheapest things in the world in America to-day are 2-cent postage stamps and human life, and we are raising the price of stamps.

Now I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not want it to be understood from any remarks made by my colleague [Mr. LEWIS] that all of the lawless people in East St. Louis on the regrettable occasion mentioned came from some place else, presumably the suburb across the river, known as St. Louis, Mo. [Laughter.] I want to correct any impression of that kind. East St. Louis has a population of over 100,000; it has a considerable overflow of the industrial enterprises that come to the Illinois side for the purpose of escaping the bridge arbitrary on east-bound freights, which has led to a very large development of industry all the way from Granite City, where the Niedringhaus enamel plant is located, to East St. Louis.

I wish, by the courtesy of the Senator, to embrace the occasion to say that East St. Louis for a town of 100,000 people, while it has as large a proportion of law-abiding people as there are in the world, is absolutely the worst saloon town in America. I lived in the county where that city is located from the time I was 20 years of age until I was 23 years old, when I was reading law.

Mr. THOMAS. And the Senator is not a horrible example, either.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I will leave that to others to say; no man can estimate himself. The first time I ever knew the town it was engaged in civil war. They had two city administrations—two mayors, two city councils, and only one city hall. Several men were shot in the civil war that occurred before the disturbance was settled. If my memory serves me, there were two shot to death and a number more or less seriously wounded in the affray resulting from the breaking down of the door of the city hall by one of the rival administrations. That was during the old Bowman régime. I was living at that time almost within sight of the city of St. Louis. Since that time, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Colorado, the city has grown. Not very many weeks or months ago Judge Landis, of Chicago, held court in the city of East St. Louis, where a United States court is held under legislation permitting it. He called before him in the course of the investigation various city officials, including the mayor, in charge of the local peace officers of the city when this disturbance occurred. The investigation by the United States grand jury showed wholesale violation of the internal-revenue act, selling liquor without a license, keeping open in violation of ordinances and statutes of the city and the State, and Judge Landis was moved to call before him the city officials for an explanation of the extraordinary condition of affairs in that city. The explanation was not satisfactory. Judge Landis asked the mayor of East St. Louis whether he could enforce the statutes of the State relative to the regulation of the saloons within the city limits. After considerable talk by the court, for a time the dramshop laws of Illinois were enforced in East St. Louis.

Over across the river the city of St. Louis, Mo., is "bone dry" on Sunday, unless you carry your supplies with you in some portable form. East St. Louis has been an oasis in the "bone-dry" desert of St. Louis for years. The immigration across the bridge not only shows itself in cash receipts on Sunday and after the midnight closing hour, but it shows itself in a vastly increased traffic in intoxicating liquors in the hundreds of saloons in East St. Louis.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I want to be as courteous to my friend as possible, but I myself still have something to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to exhaust any of the information the Senator has.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator may proceed, but I will ask him to be as brief as he can.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know I am at the mercy of the Senator, and I would not occupy time at this moment if the question had not been brought up.

Mr. THOMAS. Go ahead. I will cheerfully yield for 10 minutes more.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will not understake to close the subject in 10 minutes, but I will close my remarks hoping at some future time that I may take the floor in my own right.

These delinquencies, investigated by the United States courts—the open violation of the statutes, the flagrant and contemptuous disregard of the ordinary decencies of municipal life, the flagrant sale of liquor of all kinds, from what is called in that neighborhood "3-cent nigger gin," up to the higher forms of gentlemanly dissipation at $8 a bottle—have gone on undisturbed for years inside of the corporate limits of that city.

There is also coming across the river, if the Senator will permit me further, an immigration from St. Louis, not of the desirable elements of the population but of the undesirable. Every time a pickpocket or some municipal tough, who can be dealt with by the police force of St. Louis, finds himself in sore straits he crosses the river. Like every other city of a hundred thousand population, the police force of East St. Louis does not keep pace with the increase of the city and its municipal needs. In East St. Louis he finds not only an inadequate police force to deal with him and his kind, but an indisposition to enforce the law applying to other matters, which breeds a contempt on the part of the lawless ones of a more pronounced type who come from Missouri. We get the drift of this great population across the river, and naturally when disorder occurs there is upon the fringe of the mob the usual lawless element, quick to seize the torch and the bludgeon. That is the natural result of every scheme of lawlessness hatched by whatever authority.

The Industrial Workers of the World are there, too, and, as the Senator has well suggested, they bear a portion of the blame for this affair.

With those conditions present it is the easiest thing in the world for a mob, when once formed, to proceed beyond the limits of municipal restraint. There is no adequate police force to cope with such a situation.

I shall not at this time analyze the conditions existing in that city although I believe I know them. I know that 12 companies of our Illinois National Guard, after they had arrived upon the ground, failed to restore order or to prevent some of the outrages. Some of the companies arriving early at the scene were disarmed; their authority was set at defiance; they were treated with contemptuous disregard; and outrages proceeded even after they were present.

But I wish to say, Mr. President, that the principal source of the vile, the fetid, the corrosive element that blazed the way in disorder and wrote the story of blood across the sky over East St. Louis is the infernal, lawless, damnable saloons that have infested that town and blighted the community for years, and I want to know whether the Senator will be a party to the continuance of those lawless conditions and more lawless men? That is the interrogatory I rose to propound while the Senator was dealing with the question. I will give the story as I understand it on some future occasion when I trespass on no Senator's time.

I have no words of apology for the slaughter that has happened there of American citizens who, under the full panoply of the laws of their country, have been brutally outraged, taken into alleys, shot by revolvers, beaten to death with bludgeons, burned in their own homes, and, fleeing to an opera house for safety, have had it burned and wrecked over their heads, with the result that 34 charred corpses have been taken from the ruins—I have no apology for that for my own State or for any other State. It is something that ought never to happen, and would never happen except for the inherent defect that is lurking in our system, mentioned by the Senator from Colorado—the increasing contempt for law and order that is springing up all over this country and resulting in a grand procession of criminals. It is the saloon keepers of East St. Louis and their kind who lead the van of every lawless movement, and breed and spew their infamous vermin upon every community where they are suffered to exist. I am a "bone-dry" Senator from now on.

I am a bone-dry Senator. There are more distillers in my State than in any other country in the world. Just across the river is the largest brewery in the world. There is not a place in my State where the Anheuser-Busch Co. does not have an agent. I am about to the 10-minute time, Senator. But these are a part of the underlying economic conditions, based upon greed and human appetite, that lead to such outrages as were referred to by the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the question asked is a decidedly long one, and much longer than my answer. The Senator's question followed an extended and eloquent description of conditions in the city of East St. Louis, conditions which I will not undertake to deny, conditions of which I know comparatively little. I do know, however, Mr. President, that similar outrages, sometimes against blacks and sometimes against whites—not so extensive, perhaps, nor so atrocious—have been perpetrated in communities which do not deserve the criticisms that the Senator levels at the city of East St. Louis. I know that there are conditions, competitive conditions, in this country breeding outrages upon life and property with which the liquor element will mingle where liquor is sold or permitted, but which do not depend upon and are not bred by those conditions. They lie deeper, they are more extensive, and they must be dealt with accordingly.

Now, the Senator asked me a question which indicates that in his opinion I am identified with the liquor interests. I am not, Mr. President. I never was; I never expect to be. There is written in the body of the proposed revenue law a prohibition upon the manufacture of distilled liquors during the existence of the war, and that also appears in the amendment which is offered here. I am in favor, heartily in favor, of that restriction, but I am painfully aware of the fact that in the great bonded warehouses of this country are quantities of distilled liquor sufficient to meet the demands of consumption for several years. It is my prediction that if the House amendment to this bill shall be enacted into law it will so vastly increase during the next three years the consumption of the only liquor which will then be left for men to secure that there will be in the State of Illinois before the war is ended not one East St. Louis, but half dozen of them; and they will be in other States, for as sure as fate, if we are to put an immediate quietus upon the manufacture of fermented beverages we shall vastly increase the consumption of distilled beverages so long as men can get them. No one will contend that as between the two the consumption of distilled liquors is not the worst and produces by far the worst consequences. So much for the Senator's question.

But, Mr. President, when I was interrupted by the two Senators from Illinois I was considering the query of the Senator from Idaho with regard to the effect upon crime in Great Britain of the reduction there of the quantity of consumption of fermented beverages, which he says has been effected.

I do not pretend to any accurate or, indeed, to any knowledge upon that subject, but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] has called my attention to a statement of Lord d'Abernon, the liquor controller, as he is called in Great Britain, and he has expressed himself regarding it through Mr. Joseph W. Grigg, the staff correspondent of the World, in the following language. Let me say that I neither indorse nor condemn his statement. I read it for what it is worth in connection with the query of the Senator from Idaho:

DOESN'T SEEK PROHIBITION.

"Desirable results can be attained without prohibition. It would lead to reaction in England. It has led everywhere to shebeening (an Irish term for drink privately and unlawfully sold), drug taking, and consumption of methylated spirit. Alcoholism and drunkenness are largely the product of bad laws.

"It is possible, if not easy, to regulate the liquor traffic infinitely better than hitherto in any country, provided the views of the extremists are set aside and moderate and scientific regulation intrusted to an independent body free from political bias and political pressure."

He emphasized three outstanding features responsible for the success attained by liquor-control regulations in Great Britain:

1. Liquor of lower strength consumed under more healthy conditions.
2. Liquor consumed in "broken hours"—that is, the opportunity for overindulgence is not possible when the consumption is held within 5½ unconsecutive hours as against prewar consecutive drinking period of 17 out of 24 hours.
3. Abolition of treating.

LESS TIME FOR DRINKING.

"Competitive selling," said Lord d'Abernon, "was found to be one of the main causes of excess. This competition has been reduced, but further progress can be made in this direction. By control methods the profits of the trade have hardly been affected, and the exploitation of the trade has been more efficient and less extravagant."

As an example of what has been achieved by the reduction of hours, Lord d'Abernon said:

"When drinking was possible for 17 hours a day, it had such a bad effect on labor that two shifts were often necessary, where now only one shift does the work."

The weekly average of convictions for drunkenness in Great Britain reached a total of 3,956 for the four weeks preceding the new order of things.

This seems to be in line with the Senator's statement:

The average for the following four weeks ending on April 22, 1917, was only 1,421. Regarding this decrease Lord d'Abernon said:

"The heavy reduction in convictions for drunkenness in some areas may be accounted for partly by the withdrawal of men into the army. There has, too, in many quarters, been evident a gradually increasing sense of the seriousness of the national emergency with a consequent tendency to greater self-restraint and sobriety."

I have no doubt that the entire article is worthy of our consideration, but I do not propose to trespass upon the time of the Senate in reading it all. Indeed, I would have been through before now but for the interruptions, and they were very interesting ones which have occurred. I have read enough, I think, to justify the conclusion that the effect of beer drinking upon economic conservation is nebulous.

Mr. President, I do not believe that we should shift the responsibility which rests upon our shoulders in this matter upon those of the President except for reasons of a controlling nature. It is a very easy thing for us, instead of meeting an issue squarely, to provide that the President, whenever in his opinion the public good requires it, shall suspend the manufacture of fermented beverages, and thus escape disagreeable consequences which might result from the exercise of a positive authority on our own account. But there is an aspect of this proposal to endow the President with the power to determine when, if at all, the manufacture shall cease that deserves serious consideration. It is this: During the progress of the war events may arise where immediate action ought to be taken concerning it, and Congress might not be in session. For example, the shortage of grain might become so great for unexpected reasons—the sinking of an unusual number of vessels laden with grain, for instance, by German submarines, or the sudden and unexpected destruction of large areas planted with grain by storms and floods, and so forth, producing an exigency to meet which some power should be clothed with authority to act and to act expeditiously by prohibiting the transformation of edibles into beverages of any kind, nature, or description. I do not know that such an emergency may present itself, but I am impressed with the fact that it is one of the possibilities of armed conflict, and particularly a conflict such as this which is world-wide in its character, and in which all the agencies of human genius and human experience have been marshaled by one side or the other for mutual destruction. Consequently, I am inclined to look with favor for that reason only upon the proposed amendment whereby the President shall be clothed with authority to deal with this subject as events may require.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to present a proposal for a unanimous-consent agreement in the hope that the Senate may agree upon a time when a vote may be had upon the pending measure. I present the following, and ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, July 5, 1917, the Senate will vote, without further debate, upon the amendment reported June 28 (calendar day, July 2), 1917, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, viz: On page 18, strike out section 12 and insert the following:

SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the manufacture of distilled spirits for beverage purposes.

(b) Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such liquors is essential, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food or feed, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall have been given, and shall remain unrevoked, no person shall, after a reasonable time, which shall be prescribed in such notice, use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of such vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, except in accordance with the limitations, regulations, and prohibitions prescribed in such notice, or to produce any such liquors having an alcoholic content in excess of the amount prescribed therefor in such notice. When the question arises as to whether any particular product is suitable for food or feed, the question shall be determined by the President, and his determination shall be conclusive for the purposes of this section.

(c) Except as otherwise herein provided, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be charged with the administration of this section, and he is authorized, with the approval of the President, to require the taking out of such permits, the keeping of such records, the execution of such bonds, and the observance of such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the execution of the same.

(d) Any person who willfully violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to perfect the agreement by adding after the words "distribution of food products and fuel" the following "or any amendment that may be offered thereto or substituted therefor." I do not want to confine it entirely to the amendment which was reported out by the committee, because I do not desire to preclude the offering of any amendment or any substitute to it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask to have the first part of the proposed agreement reread? I do not care to have the amendment read, but the first paragraph which expresses the terms of the unanimous consent.

The Secretary read as follows:

That at 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day Thursday, July 5, 1917, the Senate will vote, without further debate, upon the amendment reported June 28 (calendar day, July 2), 1917, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to the bill (H. R. 4961), etc.

Mr. BORAH. Does it not provide for voting on amendments to the amendments?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. On a substitute and amendments proposed to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Is the amendment offered as a substitute for the committee amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; it is the committee amendment. The purpose is to get a unanimous-consent agreement, if possible, to fix a time for voting at 5 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. CURTIS. This is the committee amendment submitted after the bill was reported?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. It takes the place of section 12 as reported by the committee?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. MARTIN. As I understand it, the amendment was offered to take the place of the amendment of the committee as reported?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is correct.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, may I ask a question? Does this unanimous-consent suggestion permit the offering of amendments after 5 o'clock or must amendments be offered before 5 o'clock?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is proposed to vote at 5 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. After 5 o'clock arrives, when the amendment which the consent agreement recites comes up for a vote, will it be open for amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is not my intention to have it so.

Mr. BORAH. Then there is no use——

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the Senator from Idaho to withhold his objection just a moment.

Mr. BORAH. I am trying to find out what the agreement means. I have not yet objected. I shall object unless the agreement provides for a vote on the amendment and all amendments thereto promptly at 5 o'clock. If it can be brought about so that it shall not be so voted upon at that time, I may look upon it differently. I yield now to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator from Arkansas will permit me, I was just going to express the hope that the Senator from Idaho will not object to it. This proposed unanimous-consent agreement was dictated hurriedly. I had no desire to shut off a discussion of the subject. I hope the Senator will help us perfect it and reach an agreement which will be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon a question? The amendment of the committee is offered as a substitute for the section as amended by the committee, not merely the amendment proposed by the committee, but the whole section?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. After the bill was reported to the Senate the committee got together and remodeled the amendment, the provision in the bill as it was originally reported. This therefore is the amendment which the committee suggests in place of the provision in the bill now.

Mr. LODGE. That would include both the section and the amendment as it appears in the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It would include it all.

Mr. LODGE. It strikes out the whole section?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It strikes out the whole section and substitutes new matter. Will the Senator from Idaho indicate his particular objection? I hope he will assist in formulating a provision which will be agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps the Senator from Arkansas desires to make a suggestion along that line.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope an objection will not be interposed to the request for unanimous consent made by the Senator from Oregon. I wish to state that if the unanimous consent is granted it is my purpose to offer a substitute for the committee amendment. The substitute which I contemplate offering is in the following language:

SEC. 12. That from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no person shall use any foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of distilled liquors, except for governmental, industrial, scientific, or medicinal purposes. Any person who willfully violates this section shall upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to commence the consideration of section 12 and dispose of it in an orderly way, but I do not want to be put in a position where I can not offer an amendment to it. Why does not the Senator from Oregon provide in his unanimous-consent agreement that we shall begin to vote upon section 12 at 5 o'clock and any amendment offered thereto?

Mr. PENROSE. Without debate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair make an inquiry, because the Chair sees some trouble here? The bill is in Committee of the Whole. What is going to be accomplished by voting in Committee of the Whole on one amendment? After it passes out of Committee of the Whole into the Senate it will be open to amendment and discussion in the Senate. The bill is not out of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was in hopes that we might reach an agreement which would practically end it in Committee of the Whole. If the suggested unanimous-consent agreement does not do that, I should like to have Senators suggest what they would like to have in it.

Mr. BORAH. I recognize that the Vice President has stated the proposition correctly, and we would not make very much progress; but if the Senator from Oregon desires to proceed along that line and along the unanimous-consent agreement to the effect that at 5 o'clock we shall then begin voting upon section 12 and all amendments thereto——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And that the section is not to be amended thereafter in the Senate. Then we shall get somewhere.

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand that this cuts off any right in the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to complete it in Committee of the Whole, and I should like to get a vote upon it as soon as it is possible to do so.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think it would be unfair for the Senator from Oregon to ask for such an agreement as that. The Senator knows that personally I am anxious to have the bill passed. He also knows that there is a minority against this provision; that when the vote was taken in the committee there were six who voted for it and five who voted against it. It is not a unanimous report. The friends of prohibition have not taken a single minute to discuss this proposition. Does the Senator from Oregon think it would be fair to close debate? Only the friends of the saloon and whisky have taken the time in the discussion of this measure. So far as I am concerned, I can not permit the Senator to get a unanimous-consent agreement simply on this one provision.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Would the Senator object to modifying the provision? I ask the Senator if it is his purpose to object to any unanimous-consent agreement upon this proposition?

Mr. GRONNA. I should think, if the Senator wants to dispose of the bill, instead of getting an agreement to vote upon one single section of the bill, we ought to have an agreement to dispose of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was my purpose, if we can agree upon a time to vote upon this particular section, then to propose a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon the whole bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to fixing a date to vote upon the amendment and upon the bill, but I certainly shall object to taking a vote upon this provision alone. As the Chair has so well said, it would not dispose of the question; it would only dispose of it in Committee of the Whole. We can take all the time we want under the rules to discuss the same provision in the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand the rule, and I do not expect to preclude the Senate from further action if it sees fit to take action on the subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Oregon, who wants to get unanimous consent in regard to this particular section, that he ask unanimous consent that a certain length of time—two or three hours, or such a matter; or four hours; whatever may be agreed upon—be devoted to the section, that the time shall be equally divided between those who are in favor of it and those who oppose it, and that the debate be limited to speeches of 15 minutes each.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to agree to that—anything to finish this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. It would hardly be fair, as the Senator from North Dakota says, to commence to vote in half an hour.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator suggest a later date?

Mr. NORRIS. I would suggest that the Senator ask unanimous consent that two hours of time be devoted to section 12 in speeches not exceeding 15 minutes, and then that the vote in the Senate shall be had without debate.

Mr. PENROSE. That would take more time than could likely be given to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. We could conclude it to-morrow.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make this suggestion: The amendment which is proposed has not yet been printed in the form in which it is finally offered; it ought to be printed and in the hands of Senators, it seems to me, because it is a very important amendment. I would suggest to the Senator that he put his unanimous-consent agreement in this form: That to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock we begin the consideration of the amendment, and that we proceed finally to dispose of the amendment and any amendments thereto, that speeches be limited to 10 minutes, and that we begin voting not later than some certain hour to be agreeable to the Senate—2 o'clock or 3 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire again to call attention to the point made by the Chair, because the Senator from Missouri said that we shall proceed to its final disposition. It is impossible to proceed to the final disposition of the bill, or any part of the bill, in my judgment, while the bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be perfectly proper to include in the agreement to meet that objection that in the Senate the amendment should be disposed of without debate.

Mr. REED. When I used the term "final disposition" I meant in Committee of the Whole. It seems to me, if we get the full sense of the Senate in Committee of the Whole, probably that will end any debate afterwards.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think there is no doubt about that; and I will say to the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that if he limits the time to 10 minutes in his proposed agreement it will be unnecessary to fix a time when we would commence to vote. It would wind itself up all right.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. If you fix a time to vote, it puts the matter in the hands of the Chair. If more Senators should want to speak than could speak within that time, whoever might be in the chair could absolutely dictate who should speak. That is a very unsatisfactory arrangement and hardly fair; and the Chair, even if he wanted to be fair, would not always know in advance which side the Senator asking for recognition was going to take, and he could not very satisfactorily divide the time. If you limit the speeches to 10 minutes the debate will end itself. It is not true that all the Senators will want to speak; and even if they did, it would not take long to wind up the debate on that plan.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the proposition suggested by the Senator from Missouri. I am satisfied with that.

Mr. NORRIS. Excepting that he limits the time when no more debate shall be had, and that might cut out somebody who would not be allowed to speak even 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will allow me, I should like to make the suggestion that we begin to discuss this amendment now and fix the limit to-morrow. We can have a recess in the meantime, so that we will lose no time on other things. Let us begin now, and fix to-morrow the hour when debate on this section shall close.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With the understanding that speeches from now on shall not occupy more than 10 minutes each.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let us wind it up, so far as the Committee of the Whole is concerned. Of course, we could not pledge ourselves as to what might occur in the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator if this amendment has been printed for the use of the Senate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes; it has been printed for some time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not read it as yet, and I understand that the Senator has just now perfected it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment on which I ask unanimous consent for a vote was printed on the 28th day of June.

Mr. BORAH. It was only printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; it was printed in the RECORD and also printed in the form of a bill. I have a copy of it here.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the members of the Committee on Finance have been working every day, as the Senator knows, for about five weeks, and have just reported their bill. They have given very little consideration, I think, to this measure. It seems to me that those who wish to consider that proposition ought to have a little time. If the Senator will ask that at some hour to-morrow we shall begin the consideration of this particular amendment, and that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes, without fixing the date, and then, when the debate is through, proceed to a vote on it, we will undoubtedly be through with it to-morrow. But I do not want to consent to fix a time for voting and fix a limit on debate without knowing whether we are going to have an opportunity to express ourselves on it, depending upon how many Senators wish to speak on the subject.

If the Senator will put it in that form—that there shall be no speech longer than 15 minutes, and a vote at the conclusion, and no Senator to speak more than once—he is bound to arrive at a time, and a reasonable time, for a vote on that proposition.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon allow me to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that those who are prepared might begin the discussion of it now?

We could fix a time to-morrow—whatever time the Senate sees fit—and in the meantime those who are not now ready to proceed could prepare themselves, both from what will be said this afternoon and from what will be said to-morrow until the time when the limitation shall begin.

Mr. McCUMBER. We can go ahead and discuss it now without any agreement for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, yes; but we wanted, if possible——

Mr. McCUMBER. My point is that the time when the unanimous-consent agreement is to take effect ought not to be before to-morrow.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator suggest just what he proposes as a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. McCUMBER. If I were to put it in form, I would put the unanimous consent in these words: That to-morrow at 11 o'clock we shall proceed with the consideration of this amendment, that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the amendment, and that at the close of the discussion the vote shall be taken.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator ought to include in that all amendments to section 12.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will suggest 10 minutes, I will consent to that proposition, if the Senate is willing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That ought to include amendments thereto.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course I would not agree to anything that would not allow an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Secretary read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read by the Reporter.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. If I were to put it in form, I would put the unanimous consent in these words: "That to-morrow, at 11 o'clock, we shall proceed with the consideration of this amendment; that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the amendment"—

Mr. McCUMBER. Or any amendment offered thereto.

The Reporter read as follows:

"or any amendment offered thereto, and that at the close of the discussion the vote shall be taken."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest that in the beginning of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, where the Senator says "this amendment" it should be "section 12 of the bill."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that amendment ought to be added.

Mr. PENROSE. What is that?

Mr. NORRIS. Instead of saying that "the Senate will proceed to consider this amendment," say that "the Senate will proceed to consider section 12, and any amendment that may be offered thereto."

Mr. OWEN. "Any amendment or substitute."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Oregon if he thinks it necessary to take this unusual course. We have been proceeding with the consideration of this bill under a unanimous-consent agreement to consider the committee amendments in their order—to read the bill for committee amendments. This amendment has never been read under that order. It has not been considered. It has not been brought up.

I am just curious to know the necessity for this unusual proceeding of getting a unanimous-consent agreement as to when we shall vote upon an amendment that has not yet come before the Senate and has not been considered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know that there is any pressing necessity for selecting one particular section of the bill to be voted on now; but I believe that that section is the storm center of the bill, and I thought that if it were out of the way it might possibly hasten the consideration of the other amendments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I ask the Senator what it is that leads him to believe that this is the storm center of the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Possibly one of the speeches that the Senator from Washington made very fervently and very eloquently the other evening, when something was suggested about the bill. I think the Senator feels as I do. Without any particular evidences of the fact that this is the storm center, I think he has a sort of feeling that it is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, Mr. President; my speech was made to controvert a statement on the floor here that the friends of temperance had been delaying the bill; that was all. Everybody knew that nothing of that kind had been done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, there was the feeling on the part of the Senator, I know, and a conscientious feeling, too, and I think possibly there were some on the other side of the question who felt the same way. Whether it was justified or not, I do not pretend to say. It is because of that feeling, which we all know exists, that I thought if we could get this section behind us we would make some progress with the bill. I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I judge, of course, that those who are opposed to this proposition have satisfied themselves that they have the votes now and that they are ready to vote. We have been ready to vote all the time. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to consent to a vote then, but I was curious to know why we were following this unusual proceeding to get an agreement upon an amendment that has not yet come up and to do away with the order under which we started to consider this bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will be perfectly frank with the Senator, and say that I am going to vote for the committee amendment. I do not know how other Senators are going to vote. I have not made any effort to find out; but I do have the feeling that if that were out of the way we might make a little better progress.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question: If this agreement fixing a time to vote on this question is arrived at, is it the purpose of the Senator then to offer his cloture resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If we can agree on a time to vote on this section and a time to vote on the bill, it is not my purpose to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; certainly not.

Mr. REED. The Senator's statement is that if there should be an agreement effected fixing a time to vote on this amendment, and also an agreement effected fixing a time to vote on the bill, then he would not offer his cloture rule. Of course he would not. Having fixed it all by unanimous consent, there would be no necessity for cloture; but what I want to get at is this:

I know the purpose of this unanimous-consent agreement that is being asked now. I have not any hesitancy in stating it to the Senate and to the country. I am not trying to interpret the Senator's motives. The purpose is to remove, if possible, an opposition which comes from some Members of the Senate who are fearful that, if unanimous consent is granted generally, the amendment adopted on the liquor question will not be satisfactory to them. Therefore, if that question could be disposed of, that much of opposition would be removed.

Now, I want to do nothing to take any time. I am perfectly willing that this agreement shall be made; but I do not think it would be fair, if we make this agreement to vote on this section, that the Senator should then demand a fixing of a time to vote on the bill, and, in the event that was not done, should introduce his cloture resolution. I mean, he should not do it to-day and he should not do it within any reasonable time in the future, because that would be in the nature of getting an agreement and then proceeding to close the debate by force. I do not think the Senator ought to ask that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggested to the Senate day before yesterday what I wanted to do. I have no personal interest in this measure, but to me has been confided the duty of undertaking to get it through the Senate. We have been at it now since the 18th day of June, and from present prospects there is not any chance of finishing it within the immediate future.

Now, Mr. President, the proposed cloture rule does not stop debate. We can still talk on the bill for 96 hours. Each Senator can devote an hour to the discussion of it, even if cloture should happen to be adopted.

Mr. REED. If we are going to fight it out on the cloture principle, then let us do it without any unanimous consent of any kind; but if it is the purpose to arrive at this by common consent——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is what I want to do.

Mr. REED (continuing). You will not find me standing in the way of what I think is reasonable and fair.

Let me correct an oft-repeated statement here, that this bill has been under consideration for two or three weeks. In one sense that may be so, but not in the proper sense. The bill was brought in before the Senate, and we began the discussion of it. While that discussion was going on the committee was giving some consideration to the bill. In other words, the bill was being considered in committee while it was being considered in the Senate—a most unusual proceeding. After the discussion had proceeded at some length the House of Representatives sent over their bill. Thereupon that bill, which was different from the one we had been discussing, was substituted for the one we had been discussing, and then that bill went to the committee for consideration. While the committee was considering it the Senate was going on with this debate, and the bill was finally reported to us by the committee in a form changing it in the most radical respects. Since it has been reported back by the committee the committee has been considering other amendments; and it was only, I think, on day before yesterday that the committee brought in some amendment of importance. Even now the very amendment which it is proposed we shall give unanimous consent to consider, as I understand, has been changed in the last few minutes by the chairman, perhaps in an unimportant manner.

To say that this bill has been held up here for three weeks, and to charge that it has been delayed in the Senate, when, as a matter of fact, the committee itself has hardly been ready with its final report up to this hour, is not just the way in which the matter ought to be stated.

I want to say this in conclusion: I want to further the removal of difficulties. Hence I am perfectly willing to agree to the unanimous-consent proposition which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has made with reference to this section; but I do not want the Senator who is in charge of the bill then to say, "Now, having gained this much by unanimous consent, I propose to put on a cloture rule."

There has been no filibuster on this bill. There have been many changes in it, and I hope there will be many more. No matter how impatient the country may be, or those who hope to administer it, this is a bill that concerns the welfare of the whole Nation, that affects in the most radical way all lines of business. Outside of the declaration of war, there never has been before the Congress of the United States a proposition that is anything like as important as this bill. While we have been considering it here, committees have been engaged in important work elsewhere, and some of the most prominent Members of the Senate have been constantly engaged on the work of the Finance Committee.

So I hope I can have an understanding with the chairman of the committee that he is not going to try to force cloture if we make this agreement. I do not mean that that shall hold forever, but I think after this matter has been disposed of two or three days ought to be allowed to elapse. In the meantime we may be able to dispose of all the other knotty problems.

Some men are quibbling about prohibition here. Some men are greatly concerned in that. I am greatly concerned in the proposition that the farmer, whose prices are going to be regulated, as we all know, shall be protected against the injustice of being compelled to buy in a market the prices of which are fixed by European conditions, and then sell his stuff in a market that is controlled. That is the question in which I am interested, and I think it is about a thousand times greater than this whisky question. I should like to have that settled.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the criticism of the Senator that this bill is following a bad method of procedure that has not been followed by other bills is hardly just, because nearly every bill of any importance that has been considered by the Senate of the United States has had amendments brought in from time to time by the committee to improve it in some way or other, suggested sometimes by the discussions that are had, and sometimes born by recommendations from outside of the Senate. So that the procedure with reference to this measure is about the same as with reference to other measures of the kind.

I do not believe we will get anywhere with this bill, in view of the discussion that has been had, unless we get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on this particular amendment and on the bill itself. If the Senator will suggest a later date for a vote, either upon section 12 or upon the bill itself, I shall not object to that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion to the Senator, why not add that at the hour of 3 o'clock we shall begin voting upon the bill and all amendments thereto, and that the debate shall be limited to five minutes on the part of each Senator? That would be a final disposition of the bill. When you have a final disposition of this amendment, you are nowhere; but if you ask for a final vote upon the bill and all amendments thereto, and limit each Senator to five minutes, you will soon close up the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is only one amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not believe that would be feasible. I should like to see a vote upon the bill as soon as possible; but whenever opportunity is offered, amendments will be brought forward relating to the coal situation, and possibly to the metal situation. The former is vital, even more important than the matter of food control, just at this particular time; and it would be utterly impossible to present by 3 o'clock to-morrow the amendments that will embody the views of the members of the committee who have been investigating this subject. It could not be done.

When the proposal for unanimous consent for a vote upon the entire bill is before the Senate, I intend to ask the Senator from Oregon to modify it——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will.

Mr. CUMMINS (continuing). At least so as to include a reasonable time that shall be devoted to the consideration of the amendments relating to coal and metal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the bill itself.

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill itself.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggest what I send to the desk as a unanimous-consent agreement on the pending amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Let the Secretary read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that at 11 o'clock a. m. on the calendar day of Friday, July 6, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of section 12 of the bill H. R. 4961; that during the consideration of the said section no Senator shall speak more than once or for a longer period than 10 minutes; that the amendment proposed by the committee, with such amendments as may be offered to it, shall first be considered; and that the section as finally amended in Committee of the Whole shall not be reserved for amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that covers the suggestions of the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this request there is no provision made for discussion of any amendment that may be offered. I think there ought to be a limit upon the time that each Senator can speak upon an amendment, and I believe that five minutes is ample time to speak upon any amendment that may be offered to this particular section. If the Senator will add that, I think it will be satisfactory all around.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, I will add that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us see, now, what is asked.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am ready to vote on the entire bill; the sooner the better. I do not want more than 10 minutes, but I want that 10 minutes at some time before section 12 is disposed of.

I do not understand that there is any necessity for the application of this voluntary cloture just now. I understand from the cloakroom gossip that there are enough votes to put section 12 in a satisfactory condition; and when the votes are here there is no particular precipitate haste required to force the rule of the majority.

For my part, I see no reason for singling out section 12. There are a number of other sections in the bill. I do not want to object to a vote on any section of it. I am perfectly willing to vote on section 12 within any reasonable time—not at 5 o'clock this evening, however. I shall object to that. I do not understand that there is any use in imposing a voluntary cloture on the Senate. I am going to object to that, unless the request is modified in some way.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to suggest any modification that he thinks would be desirable. I think if the Senator will hear the proposition read he will not be dissatisfied with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state that I will not make any objection if it is along the line the Senator is explaining. I think 11 o'clock to-morrow, with 10 minutes' time limit, will be sufficient for anybody.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And five minutes on each amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I want to understand, first, before I refrain from objecting, what effect this will have on the consideration of the rest of the bill. When that is disposed of will it go along in due order?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggested a while ago that if the Senate would agree to vote on this amendment at a fixed time I would request a vote on the whole bill at such time as the Senate thinks will be a reasonable time—Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday or Thursday of next week. I am not particular about the time, but I should like to be able to say that the bill will be voted on at a certain time. There is no disposition to preclude anyone from discussion. The time can be put far enough ahead to give all Senators an opportunity to be heard.

I do not want to ask for this particular unanimous-consent agreement with anything concealed as to what I desire to ask. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] said that he might object to it if a second unanimous-consent agreement was going to be asked, and I did not want anybody to feel that I was concealing my purpose to make that request.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator is going to ask unanimous consent to fix a time to vote on the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Washington. When this agreement is made?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is the important thing—the passage of the bill, getting it through. I should not be disposed to consent to this proposal unless the Senator is going to try to fix a time to vote on the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is my purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What I am interested in is the passage of the bill. That is the reason why I am willing to cease discussion upon this amendment, to hasten the passage of the bill; but if disposing of this amendment will not hasten the passage of the bill there is no reason why we should cut off all debate upon this one proposition.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, as I understand the request for unanimous consent is to fix the time for a vote on section 12 and amendments thereto, with certain limitations as to debate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. STONE. The request is, as I am told—I have just come into the Senate Chamber—that that vote be taken at 5 o'clock this evening or 5 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary may read it, so that the Senator will see just what it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that at 11 o'clock a. m. on the calendar day of Friday, July 6, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of section 12 of the bill H. R. 4961; that during the consideration of the said section no Senator shall speak more than once or for a longer period than 10 minutes upon the section as a whole, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered thereto; that the amendment proposed by the committee, with such amendments as may be offered to it, shall first be considered; and that the section as finally amended in Committee of the Whole shall not be reserved for amendment in the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to amend his unanimous-consent request so as to begin at 3 o'clock instead of at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

I will say to the Senator that I have been very much engaged up to almost yesterday or day before with a very arduous service imposed upon the Committee on Finance, and I have not been able to give attention to the legislation pending. I am interested in the particular matter referred to in the request for unanimous consent, and I have been to-day, for the first time, conferring with Senators. I should be glad if we could have a little more time for consideration.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, Mr. President, I would have no objection——

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will arrange for 3 o'clock, I have no objection to a limitation on debate, and to fix the time at which we should vote upon the amendment at 6 o'clock or 5 o'clock—any time—7 o'clock; whatever time he thinks wise.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suppose it is immaterial whether we commence at 11 o'clock or 3 o'clock. The Senate, if it feels the bill ought to be hurried, could work at night.

Mr. STONE. But there are other reasons, I think, if the Senator will pardon me for not stating them, that are not occult or dangerous, but they will be the result of conferences that ought to be held.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall not object to that suggestion—to commence at 3 o'clock instead of 11 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to make an inquiry. Does that mean that the purpose of the Senator from Oregon would be that the Senate shall continue in session all through the evening or that at a reasonable hour a recess shall be taken until Saturday?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know, Mr. President, what the Senate might do, but I should like to get the amendment voted on.

Mr. PENROSE. I only wanted to ask the Senator what he had in his mind on that point.

Mr. STONE. Why not fix an hour, say 6 o'clock, to vote?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have that done.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think the Senator could get consent to that?

Mr. STONE. Well, say 7 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. I think it ought to be understood, without being embodied in the agreement, that a recess will be taken at a reasonable hour and a final vote taken on the bill on Saturday.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest to the Senator that we make it 2 o'clock instead of 11 o'clock.

Mr. STONE. I shall not object to that.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, Mr. President, one more inquiry: Do I understand now that after 2 o'clock amendments can be offered in the Senate to that section of the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

Mr. REED. I still want to understand about the question of cloture. If I understand the Senator from Oregon, he will not offer his cloture proposition for a day or two. He can, of course, present his request for unanimous consent at any time, and we may be able to arrive at a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I want to ask for a unanimous-consent agreement on the whole bill.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to the Senator doing that, but I am interested in the question of cloture.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Would the Senator from Missouri object, if we make this agreement with reference to section 12, to agreeing for a time when the bill itself should be voted on?

Mr. REED. If this agreement is now made the Senator from Oregon, of course, could present a request for a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the bill as a whole, and, so far as I am concerned, I want to be free to pass upon that matter when it is presented. If it is presented in a manner which commends itself to me I shall not oppose it, but what I wanted to get out of the way was not the unanimous-consent agreement, but if we make the unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon this amendment I want an understanding that the Senator from Oregon will not try to force cloture upon us at least for two or three days. Otherwise he would get a unanimous-consent agreement, and then might go on with the cloture.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Oregon can go on with it now.

Mr. REED. Of course he can go on with it now. I understand that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to the Senator that I have no disposition in the world to undertake to cut off debate on this bill. It seems to me, as evidence of my feeling in the matter, that if we agree to vote upon this question the Senator ought to be willing to fix a time, sometime next week, to vote on the bill itself. At least 42 Senators have signed the motion for a cloture. Many asked to sign it, and some have been asked to sign it. So there is a difference of opinion amongst Senators about the matter.

It seems to me, however, that after agreeing upon this motion we might then agree upon a time to vote upon the general bill, and fix it at a time when the Senator from Missouri must know all reasonable debate would have ended.

Mr. REED. That may be very true, but that is not the question I am trying to get at. That is the question of agreement. I have never been found unwilling to consent to any reasonable agreement that was offered. The other is a question of applying force. I want some assurance if we make this agreement that it will not be immediately taken over by those who are in favor of closing debate, and then they will move forward to force a cloture, and do it immediately. I do not ask the Senator finally to waive his right to cloture; but I do think, if this agreement is to be made, the Senator ought to state to us that at least he will delay trying to force cloture for a day or two after this matter is disposed of.

With reference to the time, let me say to the Senator, and to all Senators here, in all fairness, this day has been taken up by the friends of this bill; it has been taken up by Senators who are ready to vote for the bill, I think, as an entirety; and yet one of those Senators—the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]—has injected into this debate a question touching the control of the coal mines and of their entire output. If that question comes before the Senate it is certainly worthy of serious consideration, and it must have serious consideration; and other questions will come forward.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me ask the Senator this question: Suppose we make the unanimous-consent agreement which is now pending, would the Senator from Missouri object to a unanimous-consent agreement on Saturday to vote next week on the whole bill?

Mr. REED. This coming Saturday?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. REED. I do not think the Senator from Oregon really could mean that—to debate this bill until to-morrow night and then vote on the whole bill on Saturday.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstands me. The agreement that we are now about to make will probably end to-morrow night or Saturday. Would the Senator object to a proposition for a unanimous-consent agreement at that time proposing to vote on the whole bill on Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday of next week, or such time as would be necessary to give a full discussion?

Mr. REED. There is a great deal of difference in Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday. I can only answer the Senator——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this discussion would be more illuminating if it were audible.

Mr. REED. I think that the proper thing to do would be to dispose of this prohibition proposition; to do it to-morrow under a unanimous-consent agreement; and to have an understanding that the Senator from Oregon will not immediately proceed to try to force a cloture. Then let us take up the other great provisions of this bill, and see if we can not dispose of them under the same method we are now undertaking to employ, and go along here in something like the old spirit—that every question is to be given proper consideration and that no Senator is to try to obstruct the public business. I think we will get along in that way.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me ask the Senator again—he has not answered what I suggested—if no attempt is made to force cloture now, and we agree upon the proposition that has just been made, would the Senator interpose an objection on Saturday, the day after to-morrow, to consenting to vote on the bill one day next week?

Mr. REED. Some day next week?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. No; I think that is long enough.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think so, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to have that put a little more definitely. What day next week?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, as the Senator from Missouri has suggested, this is an important bill; it is measurably a revolutionary measure, and I have no disposition to limit debate upon it unreasonably; but if we can agree upon a time for a vote on it about Wednesday of next week, it seems to me all Senators will have had ample time to discuss it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am interposing merely for the purpose of finding out the date upon which we were going to get a final vote upon the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I realize that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the Senator from Oregon will modify his statement so that the Senator from Missouri will agree not to interpose an objection to taking the vote upon the whole bill not later than 5 o'clock or 6 o'clock on Wednesday of next week, it seems to me that might suit all of us.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not asking that such an agreement be made now, but that the Senator will not interpose an objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the hope that if you give in to the Senator's condition he will give in to yours.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not like the form this is taking. Evidently I am being treated as though I were the only Senator in the Chamber opposed to taking a vote, the only Senator to be dealt with. There are a good many Senators in this body who will have to be considered in this matter. What I have asked the Senator to do is this: To agree not to undertake to apply force in order to close this debate, at least until a day or two has passed, if we make this agreement now. I have said to him that just as soon as these important amendments can be disposed of, I shall be as ready to vote as any other Senator; but I do not think any Senator ought to be asked now to consent absolutely to vote on some particular day next week when these great amendments lie here that change the whole nature of the bill.

I am willing to say, however, that I will not object to voting some day next week, and to fix the particular day, but I do not want to do it at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as I understand it, the request made by the Senator from Oregon is that a time be fixed for a vote upon a particular section of the bill at a particular time after certain debate upon the section and upon amendments to it. The Senator from Missouri then rises in his place and says that he personally will consent to that conditionally, and his condition is that one of the rules of the Senate shall not be invoked for one or two days; he does not state whether "one or two," but either one or two or "a few" days. Then the Senator from Oregon comes back, replying to a proposition with a condition, with another proposition for another condition; and it seems to me that he has just as much right to do that as the Senator from Missouri had to reply to a clean-cut proposition with a first condition. The countercondition of the Senator from Oregon is that the Senator from Missouri himself personally will agree that if the Senator from Oregon will now agree to his condition then the Senator from Missouri must agree to the condition of the Senator from Oregon, which is that not later than 5 or 6 o'clock upon Wednesday of next week there shall be a procedure to begin to vote upon the bill and the amendments to the final disposition of the bill itself. I see nothing that "singles out" the Senator from Missouri, except the fact that he made one condition and the Senator from Oregon replies to that with another and a countercondition. It was a personal condition proceeding from the Senator from Missouri in the first case and it was a personal condition proceeding to the Senator from Missouri in the second case.

Now, if we are to be asked to make an agreement here not to invoke one of the rules of the Senate, the Senator from Oregon can not make such an agreement. It is not like a unanimous-consent agreement. A unanimous-consent agreement binds the entire Senate; but to make a condition and respond to it by another condition binding every Member of this body not to invoke one of the rules of the Senate, it seems to me could hardly be done; and I think if the Senator from Missouri will think about it a moment he will conclude with me that it can not be done in any fair, binding manner unless the proposition to take a vote upon the entire bill were embodied in the same proposition as that for unanimous consent to take a vote upon section 12.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that if this proposal for unanimous consent is agreed to, I will not undertake to ask for unanimous consent now to vote next Wednesday, but I will ask it on Saturday; and if unanimous consent is not then given, I will file a motion for a cloture.

Mr. REED. The Senator will ask it on Saturday of this week?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not for a vote on Saturday of this week. The Senator misunderstands me; but if the unanimous-consent agreement that is now proposed is adopted, I will not ask anything further of the Senate now, but on Saturday of this week I will present a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the whole bill Wednesday or Thursday of next week; and if that agreement is not obtained, I will then at once file a motion for cloture under the rules.

Mr. REED. I see no objection to that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. STONE. I should like to hear the agreement read as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

That at 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Friday, July 6, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of section 12 of the bill H. R. 4961; that during the consideration of the said section no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the section as a whole, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered thereto; that the amendment proposed by the committee, with such amendments as may be offered to it, shall be first considered; and that the section as finally amended in Committee of the Whole shall not be reserved for a separate vote or amendment when the bill reaches the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I rise to offer an amendment to the bill. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not sure but that the roll ought to be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I am. It only requires a roll call when a vote is to be taken on the final passage of a bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is all right.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I intend to propose an amendment to the act looking to the control of the officials who will discharge the functions and powers imposed upon the President of the United States under the act. It is perfectly obvious to every Senator that the President of the United States will not administer this law himself. It will be turned over to many officials, and we have no adequate way to prevent the officials dealing in tyrannical conduct. Some of them may even be guilty of blackmailing citizens and corporations and business under the powers of this act. There ought to be a summary way in which to deal with officials who are exerting the enormous powers which we propose to give to the President of the United States. I have proposed a plan which I will ask to have printed in the RECORD and I will ask Senators to read it.

The amendment submitted by Mr. OWEN is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. OWEN to the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, viz: At the end of the bill insert the following:

There is hereby authorized and established a court to be known as the "Official Court," to consist of one judge for each judicial circuit of the United States, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the terms of said judges at the beginning of the service to be from one to nine years, respectively, to be determined by lot, and thereafter each successor shall hold for the term of nine years unless sooner removed for cause by the President.

The salary of such judge shall be $6,000 annually.

The judge of the official court shall have jurisdiction over every case of malfeasance, misfeasance, nonfeasance, or neglect of duty in office of any employee, adviser, committeeman, or officer appointed under the authority of the United States except members of the President's Cabinet and justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, with power to issue summons for witnesses, to require the production of evidence, to punish for contempt and render judgment on questions involving official misconduct, and issue writs necessary to carry out the authority herein given. The marshal of the United States district court shall serve the writs of the judges of the official court.

Any person, natural or corporate, upon filing bonds for the costs of the suit shall have the right to enter a complaint against any such employee of the United States for malfeasance, misfeasance, nonfeasance, or serious neglect of official duty. The judges of the official court shall impose a fine, but not exceeding $5,000, upon the complainant where the complaint is frivolous or insincere. The costs of the proceeding shall fall upon the complainant if not sustained, and upon the defendant if sustained.

Upon such complaint being filed, the judge within whose circuit such complaint is made shall immediately require the evidence to be submitted orally and recorded or by depositions within 10 days from the date of the filing of the complaint, except upon special order where compliance is impossible, and within 10 days from receiving such evidence the judge shall make his findings.

There is hereby authorized an appellate official court to consist of three justices to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The appellate official court shall make rules and regulations and determine forms of procedure for the official court and for appeals therefrom; shall have power to issue such writs as may be necessary to exercise its jurisdiction; and shall sit in Washington City, D. C.

All appeals to the appellate official court shall be made within 5 days from date of the publication of the judgment of the judge of the official court and shall be passed upon within 30 days of the receipt thereof.

The appellate official court justices shall hold office for a period of nine years, one for three years, one for six years, and one for nine years, to be determined by lot, and thereafter each justice shall be appointed for a term of nine years and shall have original jurisdiction over cases arising in the District of Columbia.

The appellate justices shall receive a salary of $7,500 annually.

In the event of a final judgment by the official court against an employee or officer of the United States, he shall have the option of resigning within five days of the rendition of the final judgment. In the event his resignation is not submitted, the office shall be declared vacant and filled by a new incumbent.

The dismissal from office under the proceedings herein authorized shall not preclude a trial or conviction under the Criminal Code where a violation of the statutes is exposed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the amendment which I stated a while ago I intend to offer as a substitute for the committee amendment to section 12 be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed.

Mr. MYERS. Is the committee amendment to section 12 now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment of the committee is before the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment which is identified and being designated as section 12. I move that the committee amendment be amended by inserting between the word "spirits" and the word "for," in line 3 of the printed amendment, the words "or vinous, malt, or fermented liquors."

I wish further to amend by striking out the committee amendment after line 3 in the printed form thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table. It is not in order now.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table, and I send to the desk a written form by which it may be printed. I ask that it may lie on the table, to be brought up in regular order whenever we get to voting on amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for a division.

Mr. REED. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 11 in the committee amendment the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] proposes, in line 21, to strike out the words "foods, feeds, and fuels" and substitute therefor "necessaries as defined in this act."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, that would put the President of the United States to the duty of buying iron and its products, copper and its products, steel and its products, wool and cotton and their manufactured products, and reselling them to the public. I hope it will not be adopted. I think it would destroy the provision.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the amendment simply gives the same power to the President over other necessaries which it gives over fuel and foodstuffs. If the necessity to obtain reasonable prices of other products is not as great as it is to obtain a reasonable price for wheat, then I can not understand the debate in the Senate for the last two weeks on the bill. It is conceded that many of the necessaries named in the first section of the bill have gone up in price, and they are as important as wheat.

As I said before, I believe it is more evident now that the scheme of the bill originally was to force down the price of the farmers' wheat. It is evident now when we come to put in the other great staple necessities of the country and it is objected to giving the President the same power over them that was given over wheat. I know no reason why, if we are going into the price-fixing business, we should not fix the price of some of the other necessaries as much as wheat. To-day you can not sell wheat in the wheat-raising States because we have destroyed the market. Now, go ahead and you will not have any market for the farmer at all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I merely wish to state to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that he has entirely misstated the object of those who are trying to work out some scheme. It was not the object to lower the price of wheat; I have never heard that seriously discussed by the proponents of the bill; but it was by some means to guarantee abundance enough to meet our requirements, and if it was found that some individual somewhere, by combination of money and men, was forcing it up unduly high that they could deal with that situation. I have talked with those who had this matter under consideration as well as those who originated it, and their object was to guarantee this country and our allies an abundance of wheat. That seemed to be the object of all this legislation.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if I understood him correctly to say that the bill was not designed to lower the price of foodstuffs.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am not talking now about what might come out of the bill; but those who are to have the administration of it—Mr. Hoover and others whom our committee have interrogated—have iterated and reiterated that their object was to encourage an abundance of production of foodstuffs by guaranteeing the farmer a profit and relieving him from the menace of inflated prices at one time and reduced prices at another time, and to guarantee a profit that would encourage the farmers to grow plenty of foodstuffs both for America and for the allies.

I believe myself that the bill needs amendment. I do not believe that as it is drawn it is going to carry out the purpose for which it was alleged to have been drawn. I think the language should be modified so that the farmer may not be menaced, or as some one expressed it here that there should not be a club held over anybody but an encouragement from the very first page of the bill to the last page to the patriotic producers of this country to bend every energy to produce a maximum amount so that the menace of starvation or shortage of food will not be before the country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. REED. If the Senator believes that the purpose of those who originated the bill is to raise the price of farmers' products, then why does he not want cotton to be included in that beneficial scheme?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am saying to the Senate now that I am not defending the terms in which the alleged purpose is expressed. My object in rising was to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if we want to guarantee an abundance of food in this country we ought to fix the bill so as to guarantee it and not menace the price to the farmer; and I am claiming that in my opinion the bill will be a menace as it is now written. We ought to so frame the bill that it will encourage production and not threaten the man if he does not produce.

Mr. REED. Now, there are two ways of encouraging. There are two ways of producing that result. One would be to write in the bill the price the farmer is to receive. The other would be to write in the bill some provision that would guarantee the farmer if the price of his product were reduced that the price of everything else would be reduced correspondingly.

The amendment which is now before us, which was offered by the Senator from Iowa, is along the line of putting every one of the great necessities under the same control, the idea being that if one is to be reduced the others ought to be correspondingly reduced. I therefore am in favor, if that is the proposition before us, of putting into one common control everything that the farmer buys, because we propose to put into that control everything he has to sell.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Just let me answer the statement made by the Senator from Missouri. He said that there are two objects. One is to guarantee a price that will encourage production; the other is to guarantee that what the farmer has to buy will not eat up what little profit might accrue from the price that he may receive in the open market.

Under the present condition and at this stage of my investigation I think possibly the thing for us to do is to agree on some definite price that we know would encourage an abundance of bread production in this country and fix it so that the farmer would get it.

Mr. REED. Very well, now——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Put it in the bill, if necessary in explicit terms, so that there could be no gerrymandering to commit the farmer to a vast acreage over the yield of which he has no control.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to show my distinguished friend and the Senate just how idle it is to dream that dream by sending to the desk to be read a letter from a farmer in my State, a good-faith farmer, who writes with a stub lead pencil, but I think all the Senate will learn something by listening to the words of this agricultural philosopher. I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before that is done, I merely wish to make one observation. I do not want to be misunderstood. I have had but little to say in the general debate on the bill, but I propose to have something to say before it is closed. I desire to put myself squarely with reference thereto. I think we all agree that Congress should devise some plan by which the menace of a short bread crop may be removed, if possible. The shortage of foodstuffs is the underlying principle of all that is said in the conditions which now confront us. If we make a mistake, it is fatal and can not be remedied, because we can not force the seasons at our sweet will. It is 12 months between one crop and another, and in those 12 months the fate of the war in Europe may be decided. So, now, beginning with another seeding time in the early fall for our foodstuffs, we ought to address ourselves to this question in such a way as to put the possibility so far as our efforts are concerned beyond any doubt—that is to say, that the farmer of this country shall be encouraged to put in grain the last acre possible so that in 1918, in the reaping time, he can be guaranteed if the seasons are favorable an abundant supply of bread. I think we might accomplish that, and I shall at another time give my reasons and set forth the plans by which it may be accomplished.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am going to ask now to have the letter read, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that he has fallen into the error that many have fallen into. They tell us the most important thing is to raise bread. Mr. President, this country has always produced more bread than it has consumed, and it will continue to do it. The most important thing before us is to get our breadstuffs to Europe and to get our munitions and men to Europe. That is more important than the production of breadstuffs.

However, I wish to call attention to the fact that you will find illustrated in this farmer's letter that if you undertake to fix the price for one farm product you will thereby affect the price of every other farm product, and that you can not begin this effort and end it by simply dealing with one commodity.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I wish to call his attention to a practical illustration that was given to-day. Last year we had a very small potato crop, and the consequence was that potatoes went to $4 a bushel. The enticing price, the profitable price caused the largest acreage of potatoes perhaps in the agricultural records of the country. The result is that now there is a plethora, an overproduction; that is, for the immediate absorption by the market of potatoes. The result is that the price has gone down until by market quotations I saw in the paper yesterday it is $2 a barrel, less than a dollar a bushel.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not here.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am not speaking about the local market; I am speaking about the market quotations that go into the pocket of the farmer. He was getting $10 a barrel three weeks ago, and he is now getting $2 per barrel and has quit gathering his potatoes. The result will be that next year, with that disastrous experience, he will not plant potatoes, whereas had he been guaranteed a price for all the potatoes that he might grow and the Government had provided perhaps cold storage, cooling and curing houses, and enabled his large crop to be distributed over the 12 months of consumption he would have received a price that would have been profitable to him as well as profitable and beneficial to the consumer. It is that illustration that I have in view. You can not have the farmers plant all their acreage available in grain unless they have some guaranty that the law of supply and demand temporarily will not make them in the selling time the victim of a glutted market.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let us have the letter read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PATTONSBURG, MO., R. F. D. No. 4, July 2, 1917.

Senator JAMES A. REED,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am very much interested in the pending legislation pertaining to food and price control and the revenue measures. I am feeding two carloads of hogs on my place in Harrison County. They will now weigh about 125 pounds each and are worth about 15 cents a pound. The corn we are feeding them is worth on the St. Louis market about $1.70 a bushel, and the alfalfa on which we are pasturing them is worth, when made into hay, about $20 per ton. According to Wallace's Farmer, published at Des Moines, when prices are quoted as above hogs should be worth about $18 per hundred, according to the 10-year average of prices in Chicago. What is the Government going to do? Should I sell the above articles separately or should I finish my hogs and sell them at a price fixed by the Government, which price, if the public press is to be relied on, certain persons in high authority would have fixed away below cost? What do you think will be the policy of the Government?

Ignorance of the fundamental principles underlying the determining of the prices of agricultural products of many Senators and the public press in general is very discouraging to the farmer. Would it not be a good idea to have the elementary principles of economics taught in a "night school," taught in the Capitol, for the benefit of these Senators and some others in high authority who think that the price of wheat, based on the law of supply and demand, is very much too high. The city people of this country have been spoiled. For several decades following the Civil War agricultural products were sold much below cost of production, due to the fact of a peculiar combination of circumstances, as follows: Large quantities of free fertile land, free-soil fertility, the accumulation of geological ages, large numbers of men turned loose at the close of the Civil War, many of whom went on to these free lands, including great numbers of immigrants, and the use of farm machinery for the first time in the history of the world. This combination can never be repeated. From now on agricultural products, like other products, will not for any length of time be produced below cost. The land must now be purchased at a fairly high price and the soil fertility taken out put back. What economic principles govern the price of agricultural products? Based on the law of supply and demand, I believe it can be shown that wheat and hogs are none too high; are, in fact, too low. The wheat crop of the United States in 1916 was about 40 per cent less than in 1915, and the world's wheat crop in 1916 was about 20 per cent less than in 1915. If this "night school" were established in the Capitol, one of the first laws of economics to be taught is Gregory King's, which is as follows:

A necessary meeting a physiological want like wheat, if the normal supply falls short one-tenth, the price increases three-tenths; if the supply is reduced two-tenths, the price is increased eight-tenths; if the supply is reduced three-tenths, the price is increased sixteen-tenths; if the supply is decreased four-tenths, the price is increased twenty-eight tenths; and if the supply is decreased five-tenths, or one-half, the price is increased forty-five tenths, or nine times as fast as the supply is decreased. I understand that considerable wheat has not been shipped from Australia and Argentina because of the distance. Taking this into consideration and the 20 per cent deficit, and apply Gregory King's law, and you have accounted for a great increase in price and according to natural law. Again, as a general proposition, prices depend on the quantity of money. Hundreds of millions of dollars of gold have been imported since the fall of 1915. According to a well-known principle of banking, which might be taught in the "night school," bankers make about $4 of deposit currency out of each dollar of money, and this deposit currency circulates about three times as fast, thus creating, in effect, about $12 out of each dollar of increase in gold, not counting the amount hoarded or in circulation in the hands of the people. This would have considerable effect in increasing prices. Lastly, there are many more men in the armies of the world and fewer in farming, thus increasing the demand, than in 1915. It seems to me, taking the above and other circumstances into consideration, the competitive price of wheat should be around $2.75 to $3 a bushel. It should be remembered that in other years, when there was a surplus of production, Gregory King's law worked in the same proportion, only adversely to the farmer, who was reduced to great extremity. Many city people think the farmer is rich. This opinion is far from the truth to-day. I believe the farmers are the poorest livers, considering their capital. They work long hours, still use the coal-oil lamp, have no plumbing. Their school system is no better in most cases than in frontier times.

and the country church is decaying. The reason they do not improve these things is for lack of the means to do it. And, my dear Senator, enormous consequences hinge on just treatment to the farmer. The open country is the seed bed of our population. City populations, it is generally thought by sociologists, soon die out. Not so the country's. If, then, conditions in the country are not as good or better than in the city, the best will move to the city, and the "runts" will remain in the country to perpetuate our population.

What, then, should be done? In 1916 the farmer got at thrashing time about $1 for his wheat when it was worth about $2.50. Wherein was the difficulty? Lack of information on the part of the farmer. Who was to blame? The farmer should have had a modern rural-school system as good as you have in Kansas City, in which economics and marketing are taught. The Government should have supplied him at thrashing time with all the information as to world's supply, world's demand, and probable price for several years back, and especially for the current year. Why doesn't it do it? What is it doing now? Why doesn't it send out the information at once? Who got that difference last year between the price of wheat in 1916 and the price this spring? The dealers in wheat and futures men. It is well to remember that wheat has probably not been too high, but dealers have got what the farmer ought to have had, thus leaving the farmer with not enough income to keep up his end of our civilization. What we need, I again repeat, is information and some one to take up the slack when great quantities of wheat come to market following the harvest. If the futures men are not allowed to do it, and the Government does not do it and the Government does not furnish us with any more information than in the past at the proper time, we will be worse off than ever. Can you furnish me the desired information?

Please send me copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the rest of the session, and back numbers, and any other documents and information pertaining to marketing and food control.

Why not put a tax of, say, 40 per cent on excess war profits, which would probably produce from $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000? This would enable you to leave out much petty, annoying taxes, and especially that tax that is aggravating. The postage rates, in my opinion, should not be increased.

Very respectfully,

SAMUEL D. GROMER.

P. S.—Of course, the farmers want to do their part to win this war.

G.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I notice that there has been some smiling about that letter. I undertake to say that that man knows more about economic laws from the farmer's standpoint than the average legislator knows.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator regard that as any compliment?

Mr. REED. I adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma, that that is a very great compliment to this man. I do not agree with everything in the letter, but I do say that there is one part of it that the Senate ought to consider, either in a day school or in a night school. That is contained on the very first page, where he states the proposition that he has hogs that will bring a certain price in the market; that he must feed them corn that will bring a certain price in the market; and that the relation of these two prices must be the answer to what he is to do with the hogs.

It has been suggested here to-day that everything ought to be stricken out of this bill except wheat and coal, and that a guaranteed price should be written in for wheat. Whoever makes that guaranteed price for wheat must bear in mind that if you put the price of wheat too high you will stop the raising of corn, and if you stop the raising of corn to any appreciable extent you will force the slaughtering of the beef cattle and of the hogs of the country when they are immature, and you will produce a meat shortage as a result of overproduction of wheat and an underproduction of corn and other products fit for food. So that we are dealing here with a question that does require study, and it requires a different kind of consideration than this bill has been receiving.

While I am on the floor let me ask the indulgence of the Senate for two or three minutes to say this: I do not think much of that kind of argument which begins by assuming that we must win the war, that the plan which has been proposed will win the war, and therefore that it ought to be accepted at once. Everybody agrees to the first proposition; we must win the war. The second proposition, however, is the one in dispute. Will the plan which has been submitted win the war or will it weaken us in the conduct of the war?

I warn the Senate and I warn the country that if you pass a law here that is unjust to the farmer you will cut off production at its very source, and you will do more to weaken this country than you will by taking the necessary hours to formulate a bill that will not destroy the agriculturist and will not limit production.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have here a copy of a statement by William Jennings Bryan on the subject of "Beer v. Whisky." I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BEER V. WHISKY.

The effort to separate beer and wine from distilled liquors, so as to continue their sale and use under laws prohibiting whisky and other beverages containing a large per cent of alcohol, is supported by arguments which are, to a certain extent, plausible, but the movement would not be a serious one if it rested upon argument alone. The real force behind this proposal lies, first, in the financial and political influence of the brewers, and, second, in the appetite of the drinkers. Those pecuniarily interested in the manufacture of beer or in the making of wine quite naturally contend that they are less harmful than stronger drinks, and those who are fond of their beer or wine echo the argument, but it is not likely to convince the disinterested. It may be worth while, however, to lay before the general public the objections to the beer and wine propaganda in order that well-meaning voters may not be deceived.

The first objection is based upon the fact that a surrender to the brewers and wine makers would compel the temperance forces of the country to give up the fundamental proposition upon which their entire fight is built, viz, that alcohol is a poison, and that, because alcohol is a poison, alcoholic beverages are harmful.

To draw a distinction between whisky, for instance, which contains a high percentage of alcohol, and wine and beer, which contain a lower percentage of alcohol, would be like trying to fix a line between moderate drinking and immoderate drinking.

No words have yet been coined which can fix the point at which the use of liquor becomes excessive. The line moves forward as the habit grows—it recedes like the horizon until it is lost in the black night of intoxication. Failure would in like manner, overtake any effort to fix a line between harmless and harmful alcoholic drinks. It is impossible to classify drinks according to the percentage of alcohol which they contain; they must be classified as alcoholic and nonalcoholic, because it is the alcohol in the drink that makes it objectionable.

Alcohol is harmful, first, because of the immediate injury which it does, and, second, because of the appetite which it creates. Scientific experiments have been carried so far as to leave no doubt of the injury which alcohol does to both the physical and intellectual man. Beverages that contain but a small percentage of alcohol will unsteady the nerves and impair the productive value of the drinker, no matter what his occupation may be. They will lessen the accuracy of his aim at target practice; they will increase the number of his mistakes at typesetting; they will confuse his thought and enfeeble his hand. The use of beer and wine increases accidents in industry and decreases the expectancy of the user, as measured by the insurance tables.

But even if it could be shown that the immediate effect of the alcohol contained in beer and wine was not perceptible, it would be unsafe to permit their sale and use, because alcohol produces disease in both the brain and the blood. It creates an appetite which calls for more and more and more.

The beer hall and the wine room are the vestibules, so to speak, of the whisky shop. The brewer and the wine maker are schoolmasters. They take the beginner through the kindergarten and the lower grades, instructing him in the art of intoxication until he is ready to enter upon the career of the drunkard and the sot.

But few of those who develop into whisky drinkers begin with that beverage. They commence with light wines and beer, and then go on from stronger drinks to drinks still stronger as the taste becomes fixed and the craving increases. For this reason some argue that instead of giving a preference to beer and wine it would even be safer to give the preference to the stronger drinks, on the theory that while they might more quickly kill off those already addicted to the liquor habit they would not bring in so many recruits. But it is not wise to prefer either. Both should be put under the ban, for both are enemies to man's welfare and progress.

If anyone doubts the evil effect of beer and wine upon the individual let him visit the saloons and inquire into the habits of those who have not gone beyond these beverages. He will find that even beer and wine benumb the better nature and deaden the sensibilities. They wean the father, the husband, and the son away from the family and its interests as effectually as the stronger drinks. Even before the drinker begins to stagger and reel he becomes brutish, selfish, and inconsiderate. His thirst for beer and wine will have more influence over him than the hunger of wife or child, and the coarse companionship of the bar room will have more charms for him than the holier environment of the home.

If the champions of the beer saloon and the wine room desire real information as to the character of the beverages which they are trying to protect, let them submit the question to the women voters of the country and get their opinion as to the effect of these kinds of liquor upon men. They will find that the female members of the family have accurate knowledge and very positive convictions as to the effect of beer and wine drinking, as well as to the effect of whisky drinking.

But there is also a political objection to the proposition that beer and wine be excepted from the prohibited drinks. The brewers of the United States have in recent years been the most corrupting influence in our Nation, as shown by investigations conducted in several States. No one interested in the purifying of politics can for a moment think of showing favor to so mercenary and conscienceless a group.

The objections to the sale and use of beer and wine are so weighty and so manifest that any truce entered into would be short lived. To prohibit the sale and use of whiskies and stronger alcoholic drinks, while permitting the manufacture and sale of beer and wine, would simply postpone the real struggle and strengthen the adversary for the final fight. The brewers would be encouraged by any consideration shown them and would use the Government's partiality as an argument in favor of the legitimacy of their business, just as the licensed saloon seeks to cover its crimes against humanity with the cloak of legality.

The brewers' corruption fund has grown from year to year as the temperance sentiment has more and more menaced the industry. The investigation in Texas disclosed the systematic efforts of the brewers to pollute the electorate. Huge sums have been spent throughout the country in the support of lobbies and in the subsidizing of newspapers. In Pennsylvania the brewers, by taking refuge behind the objection that their testimony would incriminate them, confessed that they would be proven criminals if they revealed the business methods shown by their books.

The fight that the brewers have made against woman suffrage is another evidence of their determination to oppose anything and everything calculated to lessen their profits. They libel womanhood while they use the barroom vote to defeat laws proposed for the protection of the home.

The country understands that the issue is indivisible. When a short time ago Congress enacted a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicants to any man in uniform, it did not attempt to draw any distinction between whisky and beer; such an attempt would have been met with derision.

The States that have prohibited saloons can not be inveigled into a return to beer or wine. When in 1914 the State of Colorado adopted constitutional prohibition, the city of Denver by a substantial majority rejected an amendment which proposed to reinstate beer. Any action by the National Congress which would seem to sanction the use of beer and wine would make more difficult the enforcement of the laws in the States, now numbering more than half of the Union, which operate alike against all kinds of alcoholic drinks.

The fight must go on; there can be no compromise. Whisky and beer must stand or fall together; it is the alcohol in both that makes them a menace to health, to home, and to all that is highest and best in the Nation. A division of the temperance forces would be disastrous. Any attempt to make a distinction between beer and whisky would drive away more voters than it would draw to the cause.

Those who have entered upon the work of making the United States saloonless will, therefore, give no heed to the plea of the brewer and the wine maker. The manufacture of these so-called milder beverages have, during all the years past, cast in their lot with the distillers. They have been partners in a long career of lawlessness; they have made the barroom a bureau of information on crime; they have clustered about the saloon every form of vice and sin. It is too late now for them to seek an extension of life by promises of reform or of separation from their associates. The entire firm of "Barley-Corn, Gambrinus & Bacchus" must retire from business—a dissolution of partnership is not sufficient.

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I call for a division.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., Thursday, July 5, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, July 6, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 6, 1917.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce the absence on account of illness of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

On June 30, 1917:

S. J. Res. 13. Joint resolution extending the time within which the "joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River" shall remain in effect.

On July 2, 1917:

S. 2453. An act to authorize condemnation proceedings of lands for military purposes.

ASSESSMENT WORK ON MINING CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service, which were, on page 1, line 10, after "been," to insert "or may, during the present war with Germany, be"; on page 1, line 12, after "States," to insert "to serve during their enlistment in the war with Germany"; on page 2, line 3, after "assessments," to insert "during the period of his service or"; on page 2, line 5, to strike out all after service," down to and including "resolution," in line 12, and insert: "Provided, That the claimant of any mining location, in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution, shall file, or cause to be filed, a notice in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, before the expiration of the assessment year during which he is so mustered, giving notice of his muster into the service of the United States and of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution."

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERNALD. I present a petition signed by a large number of students of Bates College, Lewiston, Me., favoring national prohibition. I ask that the body of the petition be printed in the RECORD, together with the number of the signatures attached thereto.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the PRESIDENT and to the SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES OF MAINE IN THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

Whereas the attention of the country has been called to the fact that "the world's food reserves are low" and that, in view of the necessity of supplying not only ourselves but our allies, "the importance of adequate food supplies, especially for the present year, is superlative"; and

Whereas the liquor manufacturers are now using over 6,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs annually, enough to feed 7,000,000 hard-working men for the entire year; and

Whereas in the present congested condition of our shipping and serious lack of adequate transportation facilities the thousands of cars used in the shipment of liquor are imperatively needed for carrying necessities of life; and

Whereas more than 165,000 men are engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor, whose labor is thus really worse than wasted at a time when men are urgently needed on the farm, in the mill, and in the Army and Navy; and

Whereas the morale of our citizens is seriously affected and the efficiency of our men both in the military service and in industry is decidedly lowered by the use of alcohol; and

Whereas we are unalterably opposed to an increased tax on liquor because, since the demand for liquor depends largely on appetite rather than price, the burden would but be shifted to the consumer and then in turn to the suffering women and children of the drinkers' families:

Therefore, we, the undersigned, students of Bates College, do hereby petition the President and Congress of the United States for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating beverages during the period of war as a necessary and logical conservation measure.

MARION C. DUNNELLS
(And 215 others).

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Port Huron, Mich., praying for bone-dry prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the First Baptist Church of De Witt, Mich., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Emery and 14 other citizens of Alfred; of the Hammond Street Congregational Church, of Bangor; of the Drexel Biddle Bible Class, of Portland; of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Falmouth and Cumberland; of the Opportunity Class of the Congregational Sunday School, of Wilton; of Sebasticook Grange, No. 306, Patrons of Husbandry, of Newport; of the Piscataquis County Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention; of the Cumberland County Sunday School Association; of the New Harbor Woman's Christian Temperance Union; of the Christian Endeavor Society of Woodfords; of sundry citizens of Harpswell Center; and of 216 students of Bates College at Lewiston, all in the State of Maine, praying for national prohibition as a war measure to conserve the food supply, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Advent Christian Church, of Bangor; of the Congregational Christian Endeavor Society, of Holden; of the Universalist Church of Old Town; and of the Methodist Church Men's Class, of Fairfield, all in the State of Maine; and of the Tristate Conference of Social Workers, of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, praying for absolute national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Piscataquis County Association of Congregational Churches and of the Aroostook and Penobscot Union, Pomona Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, all in the State of Maine, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture of intoxicating liquors from foodstuffs, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 69, International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen, of Millinocket, Me., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. I have received a large number of letters in the nature of petitions from manufacturers, merchants, and professional men, all citizens of my State, asking for the adoption of national prohibition. I ask that they be received and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE presented resolutions and petitions from the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church of Portsmouth, of the Highland Avenue Friends Christian Endeavor Society of Columbus, of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Gloucester, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Clintonville, of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of Piqua, of the Maumee Union Christian Temperance Union of Maumee, of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of the faculty and students of Wooster Summer School, Christian Endeavor Society of the Putman Presbyterian Church of Zanesville, of the First Presbyterian Church of Ashtabula, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of West Salem, of the First Christian Church of Steubenville, Methodist Episcopal Church and Sabbath School of Nevada, of the citizens of Vinton County assembled at McArthur, of the First Christian Church of Steubenville, all in the State of Ohio, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented sundry letters and memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Ohio, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT presented petitions of the monthly meeting of the Society of Friends of Rhode Island, of the Christian Endeavor Society of Perryville, R. I., and of the Local Council of Women of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Rhode Island, praying for the proper safeguarding of the moral conditions existing at military camps, which was ordered to lie on the table.

THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. SWANSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 96), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Will it be in order at this time to offer an amendment to the House provision or should it be offered after 2 o'clock under the agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be offered and lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I offer the following amendment to the House text: On page 18, line 22, strike out the word "or" and insert "or other nonbeverage purposes," and strike out the four words "or of alcoholic beverages" in line 23, so as to make a straight prohibition amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he has the House text and that he should take the pending bill with the committee amendments added to it, so that we may know where the amendment comes in.

Mr. CURTIS. My own judgment is that it should be offered to the House provision as it came to the Senate, but in order to remove any doubt about it I will offer the amendment to section 12, to strike out lines 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, down to and including the word "beverages" in line 21 and insert the following:

SEC. 12. That no person shall use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcohol, except for governmental, industrial, scientific, medicinal, sacramental, or other nonbeverage purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KENYON. We do not reach that section until 2 o'clock under the unanimous-consent agreement. Is not the question in order to proceed with the consideration of committee amendments until 2 o'clock and then to take up the special amendment which was the subject of the agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but there is no objection to the Senator from Kansas offering an amendment and having it lie on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I propose the following amendment to the amendment of the committee in section 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 21, after the word "act" in the amendment to the amendment agreed to, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed pursuant to the provisions of section 11 of this act, then the price paid for any feeds or fuels so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask unanimous consent to submit some telegrams from the prohibition workers of Mississippi and have them printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

BELZONI, OR GREENVILLE, MISS.,

ISABELLA BROWN.
WILLIAM ALEXANDER BROWN.

Mr. REED. I could not understand where the amendment to the amendment went in. Let it be read again.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after the amendment to the amendment heretofore agreed to, which reads "necessaries as defined in this act," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed pursuant to the provisions of section 11 of this act, then the price paid for any feeds or fuel so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARDING. I am in receipt of a series of resolutions passed by Pomona Grange, of Delaware County, Ohio. Two of the resolutions are so pertinent to the pending question that I ask consent of the Senate that the Secretary may read resolutions 5 and 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

5. The grange reaffirms its unalterable opposition to the liquor traffic, and is very much pleased to learn that the National House of Representatives has so nearly unanimously adopted a prohibitory measure as to the use of grains in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. It hopes for speedy concurrence on the part of the Senate in this war measure. The grange also believes that such prohibition measures are equally beneficial to our country in times of peace. The grange insists that the alluring temptations of the saloon and the brothel shall not be placed within reach of the flower of our young manhood about to be concentrated in military training camps at various places throughout our country. The grange also insists that it is the duty of our State and Nation to eradicate the saloon from all parts of our country, whether in times of war or peace, as the only sensible way of dealing with a business creating so great financial, physical, and moral loss to the manhood, womanhood, and childhood of our country. The grange recommends that the liquor now in stock in this country, which is being used to poison our own people, should be taken over by our Government, the alcohol extracted and used for mechanical purposes in the development of our country and for the destruction of our enemies.

6. In view of the fact that there have been many recommendations for expense curtailment, and that there is dire necessity for greater production of food products and of economy on the part of our people, the grange calls to the attention of the public the useless and enormous loss by fire of approximately $1,000,000,000 annually, or $10 per capita, by tobacco users. There has been much legislation and prohibition against the smoke nuisance in the cities of our country and against general incendiarism. If it is illegal to erect a building and then to set it afire, is it not equally wrong to grow crops on fertile land that would produce the necessities of life, thus cutting down the high cost of living, and then to set fire to the product raised on such land, and to inhale the poison of tobacco and blow it into the faces of others to be inhaled secondhand, or to chew the weed and then expectorate in a filthy and unhealthy manner in public or private places? The grange recommends that the people generally abstain not only from the use of intoxicating liquors, but also from the use of tobacco, and that farmers be prohibited from using land for tobacco growing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I present sundry petitions from citizens of Memphis, Tenn. They are very numerously signed and I think they are so pertinent to the issue now before the Senate that I ask that one of them be read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if they have to do with the pending measure?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I will state to the Senator that they do. The petitions are very short.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understood that we took a recess last night, and if the debate is to be opened up for the introduction of such matters I have quite a desk full here, and I presume a great many others have. It seems to me we ought to follow one plan or the other; let them all go in, or have them all go out. I think the Senator should withhold his request until he can make it a part of his remarks if he wishes to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reading the petition?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the petition be read? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Senator K. D. McKELLAR and Congressman HUBERT FISHER,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, hereby petition you as a spokesman for the people of Tennessee to introduce or cause to be introduced, and to work for the passage of, a bill designed to throw greater protection about the morals of the young men of the United States who are and who will be in the national military and naval service.

We earnestly desire that the praiseworthy orders of our military authorities designed to create "moral zones" about the camps be strengthened in every manner possible. We suggest that it be made a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine or imprisonment, or both, for an immoral woman to come within 10 miles of a military or naval encampment, regardless of its size, and that heavy penalties be provided for those selling liquor to soldiers within 10 miles of a camp, and that similar restrictions be put upon gambling and other forms of vice.

RUSSELL KENT
(And others).

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in connection with the consideration of the amendment which is now pending, and in line with the article which has already been read, I desire, as a part of my remarks, to read a telegram, which is dated at Seattle, July 2, addressed to the United States Senate, and is as follows:

The SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES or SENATOR WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Five thousand women members of West Washington Woman's Christian Temperance Union pledge themselves to rigid household economy for conservation of food supplies and vigorously protest against the waste of food products of any kind in the manufacture of beer and wine.

HATTIE B. DUNLAP,
State President W. C. T. U.
ELIZABETH E. THAYER,
State Corresponding Secretary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to section 8. In view of the amendment which has just been adopted to this part of the bill, the language which I propose to strike out is unnecessary, and the committee recommend striking it out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 18, after the word "purchase," it is proposed to strike out the words "in no case paying a less price than the minimum price, if any, fixed in pursuance of this act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the Secretary now read the amendment which we have just acted upon as amended, so that we may know just what it means.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I may state, before the reading of the amendment as amended, in order that the Senator from Utah may understand the bill as it now stands, as to the amendment to the amendment on page 11, in subdivision (b) of section 8, striking out the words "in no case paying a less price than the minimum price, if any, fixed in pursuance of this act," that I have moved to strike out that portion of it because there has already been adopted a provision which clarifies it, and it does not change the sense. The amendment to which I refer reads:

Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed, pursuant to the provisions of section 11 of this act, then the price paid for any feeds or fuels so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price.

Mr. SMOOT. That follows the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Secretary read the amendment as amended, including the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa and the one which has just been offered by the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 12, after the word, "dependents," strike out the words "for a reasonable time," and insert:

nor shall any person, firm, corporation, or association be required to furnish to the Government any seed necessary for the seeding of land owned, leased, or cultivated by them; (b) in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices necessaries defined in this act: Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed, pursuant to the provisions of section 11 of this act, then the price paid for any feeds or fuels so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a certified copy of the report of the Federal grand jury in Chicago, and instructs the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

REPORT OF THE GRAND JURY EMPANELED IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT OF THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS AT CHICAGO, AT THE JUNE TERM, A. D. 1917, AS TO CONDITIONS OF TRADE IN FOOD PRODUCTS.

The grand jurors, owing to the brevity of the term of court for which they are empowered to act and the country-wide extent of the conditions disclosed, have been unable to make that thorough examination which would warrant presenting indictments against individuals responsible for the present trade conditions in certain lines; but, enough evidence appearing to show in outline what those conditions are, and what are the systems of transacting business under which they are produced, the jurors feel that they should at least make a report to the court upon what they have found.

CANNED GOODS.

These goods are not classed as perishable, and do not require cold storage. Canners of vegetables usually dispose of their product by future sales before the vegetables are grown or canning operations begin. The goods get to the consumer through brokers, wholesalers, jobbers, and retailers. The canners, brokers, wholesalers, and jobbers have associations, which select committees whose function is to meet together at intervals. The canners, wholesalers, and jobbers have devised some means for insuring complete cooperation among themselves, which results in keeping the canner from dealing directly with the consumer or with the retailer. Wholesalers and jobbers will not buy from canners, in most cases, otherwise than through brokers. If retailers attempt to resist the combination by purchasing directly from the canner, they find it difficult or impossible to do any further business with the wholesalers or jobbers as to other groceries.

This situation compels the consumer to pay the expense of maintaining these middlemen; and in times like the present, when an unusual demand for food products exists and is likely to continue, these middlemen exert the power that inheres in this system to extort unconscionable profits from consumers, with no proportionate benefit to those who furnish the principal service, to wit, the farmers, canners, and such retailers as are satisfied with a reasonable profit above the cost.

To illustrate the foregoing, we cite the increase of the price of canned tomatoes and corn in passing through the hands of those middlemen during the past year:

Canned tomatoes were sold by the canners in the spring of 1916, through brokers, for future delivery, to wholesalers and jobbers, at 90 cents per dozen cans. These same tomatoes are being sold to-day by wholesalers and jobbers to retailers at $2.25 and more per dozen, and consumers are now getting one can for 25 cents instead of the two or three cans they got for that sum prior to this season. Cans and labels, being furnished by the canners, do not enter into this increase in cost in the hands of the middlemen.

Canned corn, which was sold in 1916 by the canner to the wholesaler and jobber at 65 cents per dozen, is selling to the retailer at $1.75 per dozen and the consumer is paying a proportionately high price.

In view of this situation in the canned-goods trade, and of the existence of similar conditions in the trade in other food products and necessaries, we urge the passage of laws to eliminate these conditions and to reduce prices to a normal basis as soon as possible.

Furthermore, in consequence of these conditions, brokers, wholesalers, and jobbers are in a position to, and many of them do, hoard up, speculate in, and demand excessive prices for, these commodities; and no doubt they are in the same position with reference to many of the other necessaries of life handled by them.

BUTTER.

Because Elgin was at one time a creamery center the people of the United States continue to follow prices quoted as "Elgin" prices, although very little butter is now made or legitimately traded in there. It seems that a few traders and dealers, most of whom are Chicago traders, take advantage of this situation to go to Elgin once a week and make a few trades on the Elgin Board of Trade, and thus establish a price for butter for those who follow Elgin quotations throughout the country. The "board" opens at 11.45 and closes at 12 noon on Saturday of each week. Practically all of the trades made on the "board" are made by these Chicago dealers who go to Elgin to attend this 15-minute session. It is a question whether the Elgin "board" is a real bona fide market for the purchase and sale of butter, it appearing that it is merely a place where a few trades are made as a basis for Elgin quotations by men who are in most cases Chicago traders, who could make those sales in Chicago without taking the trouble to go to Elgin if their only motive is to buy and sell butter.

As shown by the minutes of the 24 meetings of the Elgin board from January 6 to June 16, 1917, an average of four traders made an average of less than two trades a week affecting an average of 51 tubs of butter sold each week. As against these 51 tubs a week handled on the board at Elgin, it appears that during the same period an average of 53,000 tubs have been handled each week in Chicago.

COLD STORAGE.

It nas been the practice of cold-storage warehouse companies to lend large amounts of money on perishable food products, such as butter, eggs, poultry, etc., that go into their cold-storage warehouses.

This practice leads to speculation by other than legitimate dealers, and tends to increase the cost to the consumer. It is the opinion of this grand jury that some legislation should be passed prohibiting this practice, and also prohibiting the cold-storage warehouses from borrowing money on their own warehouse receipts on which they themselves have already made loans.

For the purpose of making public the amounts of food products in cold storage it is our opinion that legislation should be passed requiring all cold-storage warehouse companies to make reports under oath to the proper governmental department at specified times, setting forth in detail all food products held in storage by them, and whenever required to do so to furnish the names of those for whom such products are being held.

And further, that the period during which food products may be held in storage should be limited to a reasonable specified time to prevent the carrying of such products from one season to another, which practice has a tendency to limit the supply and increase the price at certain times of the year.

In addition to the reports to the Government from cold-storage warehouses, reports should be required under oath from all persons making use of railroad cars for storage purposes; that is to say, holding of products on the track after a resonable time for unloading.

Many retail dealers in selling food products to the consumer often continue to charge high prices after wholesale prices have dropped, thereby securing illegitimate and unfair profits. It is our opinion that some method of publishing the wholesale price of food products should be instituted so that the housewife may be informed of the value of foods and will know when she is being charged extortionate prices out of line with the price which the retailer is paying the wholesaler.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN FOOD PRODUCTS.

Some wholesalers and jobbers in food products urge retailers to advance prices to the consumer—advising them to put on higher prices, which gives the wholesaler a basis for charging higher prices to the retailer. To illustrate, one of the largest wholesale dealers in Chicago sent out a circular to its salesmen containing the following paragraphs:

"Our customers, in particular, have very unusual profits within their grasp at this moment. 'Will they throw them away or tuck them away?'

"Jobbers are affected; they are financially interested. They urge that the greatest haul yet made by the retail grocery world be converted into tangible assets. Wholesale houses are not legally appointed custodians or guardians for anybody, but they do have an interest at this time, one that is definable and that must be apparent to all.

"Of what earthly use are 'futures' if the benefits are wantonly wasted?

"No man ever got very far on the road to competency who was a wise buyer but a spineless seller.

"Will the grocer who has long lamented the scantiness of his profits let up now long enough to bring in the heaping basket left on his doorstep?

"Our representatives should make themselves heard at once on this readjusting of retail prices."

Another sent out a circular from which we quote as follows:

"Raise your prices now on everything we have advised you will advance. The goods are worth more money now than they are bringing. As soon as our prices advance, yours must. We are giving you the benefit of our purchases to give you the extra profit. You can get the extra price this week as well as next."

Practices of this kind indicate the necessity of legislation which will absolutely put a stop to the exploitation of war conditions to raise prices to the consumer for the benefit of the few who are handling food products.

Indorsed: Filed July 2, 1917, at — o'clock — m. T. C. MacMillan clerk.

In the United States District Court for Northern District of Illinois, eastern division.

I, T. C. MacMillan, clerk of the District Court of the United States of America for the northern district of Illinois, do hereby certify the above and foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the report of the grand jury to the court as to conditions of trade in food products as same appears from the original filed in said court on the 2d day of July, A. D. 1917, and now remaining in my custody and control.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said court at my office in Chicago, in said district, this 2d day of July, A. D. 1917.

[SEAL.] T. C. MACMILLAN, Clerk.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I inquire if the committee amendment on page 11, beginning in line 13, has been agreed to? I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment as amended has been agreed to; and if the Senator desires to offer an amendment to the amendment, the action whereby the amendment as amended was agreed to will have to be reconsidered.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment as amended was agreed to, in order that I may offer an amendment to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote whereby the amendment as amended was agreed to?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will not object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. NORRIS. Now I desire to offer the amendment which I suggested the other day and which received the approval of all Senators in the Chamber at that time who gave it any consideration. Section 8, commencing on page 10, is an authorization to the President to requisition foods, and so forth, for the Army and the Navy, and all that section down to subsection (b), in line 16, on page 11, has reference to the power to secure food for the Army and the Navy, to the taking of the food, to the payment, and so forth, for the same, and to giving the persons from whom it is taken, if dissatisfied with the price, a day in court. Then comes the subsection (b), which reads as follows:

(b) In order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase—

That is, the President is given power to purchase—in no case paying.

That has been modified; but the subsection relates to a subject entirely different and having no relation whatever to the Army and the Navy, but applying to producers and consumers generally. My amendment, Mr. President, is to strike out the letter "b" in the parentheses and substitute therefor "section 9," so that it would be an entirely new section.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to suggest to the Senator that, if he will read the context, I think he will discover that something more is necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. I think something more is necessary.

Mr. KENYON. Section 8 begins with the words:

That the President is authorized from time to time (a).

Those words could be inserted before the words "in order to guarantee reasonable prices," and so forth, in line 15.

Mr. NORRIS. I intended to offer that if the amendment I have suggested is agreed to. That would make it complete. I presume, however, it might just as well be offered as one amendment.

Mr. KENYON. That should be a part of the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I will offer that, then, Mr. President, as part of the amendment. I move to strike out the designation "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof, "Section 9. That the President is authorized from time to time."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of the committee on page 11, line 16, it is proposed to strike out the semicolon and insert a period after the word "them"; then to strike out the designation "(b)" and insert, beginning a new paragraph, the following:

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized from time to time.

So as to read:

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized, from time to time, in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities, and to sell at reasonable prices necessaries, as defined in this act—

And so forth.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I ask if the proviso is added to that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proviso remains.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then, so far as I can assent to it, I am perfectly willing to have that as a new section and to strike it out of the section where it now stands.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the effect of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that the proviso, being that part of the section following line 8, will not then qualify the new section 9. It now does. I do not think that was his purpose. I understood the Senator from Oregon just now to inquire whether the proviso remains in the section. It does remain in the section, but it qualifies only what remains of section 8, and does not qualify the new section 9, as it does in the original draft.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought that the proviso which was added a while ago by a vote of the Senate to subdivision (b) qualified only that subdivision; but if there is any question about that, it probably ought not to be transferred to a new section. My construction of the bill is that the proviso which was added qualified only subdivision (b). I refer to the proviso reading:

Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed pursuant to the provisions of section 11 of this act, then the price paid for any feeds or fuels so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, that is quite an important change. I suggest that it ought to be written out in full, and we all ought to be able to see it before it is acted upon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then it might be passed over for a moment until it can be written out; but I did not see any objection to transferring that portion of section 8 into a new section.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Oregon that I do not understand that the proviso to which he has just called attention will be in any manner disturbed or modified if the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska shall be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the only suggestion that has been made that might make it necessary to make another change is the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who says that the proviso which would then be left in section 8 as it is now would not apply to section 9. It would not be in order to amend that proviso at the present time, because it is not a committee amendment; but I would suggest to the Senator from Montana that that could easily be met by an amendment to the text, so that the proviso should apply to section 9 as well as to section 8. It would not be in order to offer that amendment now, however. I would suggest something like this:

Provided, That nothing in this section or the following section shall be construed—

And so forth. That would meet the objection made by the Senator from Montana, I think.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the changes in this section are so great that surely the Senator from Nebraska would be authorized to add the complete provision; and I suggest to him that we would like to see just how the whole of it would read before we vote on it.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that the amendment that I have suggested, making a new section of subsection (b), certainly would not have to be reprinted in order to see just what it means; but these other amendments that the Senator from Oregon has offered, that have been agreed to this morning, might have to be. I have no objection to having it go over. The section could be reprinted in full.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs leave to suggest that if this is made a new section, it will change the numbering of the other sections of the bill; and as the unanimous-consent agreement applies only to a certain section, at 2 o'clock the Senate will not be considering the section that it thought it was going to consider.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say to the Chair that my amendment, as I understand it, at least, applies entirely to a committee amendment. Subsection (b) is a part of a committee amendment. I strike that out, and put in some other language. What may be necessary later on in the bill if we should change the section of course would not make this out of order, because it would make the bill inconsistent if such changes were not made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not out of order. The Chair does not care what is done. The Senate is to consider section 12 at 2 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume it will necessitate, as very often happens in the consideration of a bill, a renumbering of the other sections, which would be done, when we got to it, by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, what is the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, in the committee amendment, on line 16 after the word "them," it is proposed to strike out the semicolon and insert a period; then, beginning a new paragraph and a new section, to strike out the subdesignation "(b)" and to insert "SEC. 9. That the President is authorized, from time to time," so that the paragraph will read:

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized, from time to time, in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices necessaries as defined in this act: Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed pursuant to the provisions of section 11 of this act, then the price paid for any feeds or fuels so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will suggest that the confusion can be avoided if my colleague, instead of making a new section, will simply make a new paragraph of this section. Then everything will read smoothly, and there will be no necessity of changing the number of the section.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to my colleague that it is already a separate paragraph, as I understand it. The object I had in making a new section of it was because the power conferred in subsection (b) is foreign to and in no way connected with the subject matter of section 8—the power conferred upon the President to buy something for the Army and Navy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think there will be any difference in effect if it is simply made a separate paragraph of this section, and it will avoid considerable confusion which will result if you undertake to renumber these sections.

Mr. NORRIS. In the debate the other day, when my colleague was not here, several Senators expressed a doubt as to just what might be done if this were connected up with the Army and Navy power as it is now. Some Senators even expressed the fear that these purchases would have to be made for the Army and Navy, when it is evidently the intention of subsection (b) to have these purchases made in the market for the public generally, and with no reference whatever to the needs of the Army or the Navy. My own idea is that a court would hold that subsection (b) applied generally, just as I think the committee intended it should apply; but I wanted, in the first place, to remove any doubt that might exist. In the next place, I wanted to make it more consistent.

As a matter of fact, here is a certain section of the bill that has to do entirely with the purchase of supplies for the Army and Navy; and tucked into that section is subsection (b), that has no reference to the Army and the Navy, that applies to the country generally and to the people generally. It would be more consistent if that were a separate section.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think my colleague will recognize that the second paragraph will have just as much dignity and just as much strength and just as much force as the first paragraph of the section. As he has phrased it, it will read:

That the President is authorized, from time to time, in order to guarantee reasonable prices—

Now, that has just as much force as the first part of the same section would have.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me call my colleague's attention to the next section. It starts out in this way:

That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any factory, packing-house—

And so forth.

Now, that deals with the taking over of factories, storage houses, and manufacturing establishments. It would be just the same from a legal standpoint if we did not make that a new section. We could tack it right on to this section. In fact, on the same theory that subsection (b) is left in as part of section 8 we ought to have only one section to the bill, because the theory of dividing a bill into sections is for the purpose of a better understanding of the bill and its simplification, taking up various subjects in different sections of the bill.

The point I am making is that section 8 deals with the purchase of supplies for the Army and Navy. We ought to have another section dealing with the purchase of supplies on the market by the President and the storing and selling of them to the people generally. We do have that, but we have tucked it into this other section. We have not done anything like that anywhere else in the bill; and it is just to make it consistent, to make it plainer. My own idea is that it does not change its legal effect in any sense.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator has not added to his second section this additional language from line 21 on down—the provision making it a revolving fund—or else it was not read.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. I will say to the Senator that my amendment does not change that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Senator did not embody that in his amendment as read. The amendment was read by the Secretary, omitting that language providing that this money should constitute a revolving fund.

Mr. NORRIS. My amendment does not change that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Senator did not carry it in his new section, and it ought to be carried in the new section.

Mr. NORRIS. It is in the new section.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not as read by the Secretary.

Mr. NORRIS. hTe Secretary, of course, did not read the entire section. He just read the amendment I offered. It does not change the language anywhere, except that the effect of it is to make a new section. The language providing for the revolving fund will be in section 9 instead of section 8. It will be with this subdivision (b) as it is now. There will be no difference in that respect.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But is there no difference in the proposed section which the Secretary read? He read, then, only part of the proposed new section.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Secretary was asked to read the proposed new section, and he stopped, as I heard him, without covering this language in the latter part of section 8. I ask that the Secretary read the entire new section as it will be according to the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. The section, as amended, will read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized, from time to time, in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices, necessaries as defined in this act: Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed pursuant to the provisions of section 11 of this act, then the price paid for any feeds or fuels so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the disposal by the United States of necessaries under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out of the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator having this bill in charge whether he understands that the amendment offered by the committee would be an inhibition upon private parties from selling at prices less than those fixed by the President?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not understand that it would, Mr. President. That was not the committee's understanding of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it is quite impossible to hear, over here, what is being said. That is a rather interesting question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope the Senator from Utah has not any great anxiety about their buying cheaper than the Government does.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Utah has a great deal of anxiety about this bill, as I think every Senator has.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I know the Senator has a great deal of anxiety about it, and that is very praiseworthy; but the suggestion that private consumers are to get a price less than the Government gets is rather astonishing.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my purpose in making the inquiry was to get the interpretation placed upon the section by the Senator in charge of the bill. It has not been printed as amended, so that it is almost impossible to determine exactly its effect; but I wanted to be sure that this fixing of the minimum price or the maximum price would not be an inhibition upon private individuals from buying or selling from private parties at prices different from those fixed by the President of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am strikingly in accord with the Senator upon that proposition; but I would not be content with the construction of the language of this amendment even by the distinguished Senator from Oregon, much as I admire him and have great confidence in his judgment. Contemporaneous construction is often valuable, but unfortunately it does not very often enter into the construction of statutes, and is not given the weight that perhaps the legislator intended that it should have.

So far as I am concerned, if this matter is to be reached and any remedy afforded to the consumer of coal, it ought to be done specifically by statute; but we must not depend upon contemporaneous construction, no matter how enlightening that is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proviso of the Senator from Oregon referring to section 11, as the Chair construes it, must now be changed to section 12.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that ought to be changed by the Secretary to conform to the proper section. I ask unanimous consent to insert in line 9, after the word "section," the words "or in the section that follows," so as to make the sense complete in view of the change that has been made. It makes it refer to the proper section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 3, to change the number of the section from "11" to "9"; in the same line, after the word "find," to strike out: "that it is impossible by license or by voluntary arrangement or agreement to assure an adequate and continuous supply of necessaries" and insert: "it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense," in line 13 after the word "mined," to insert "and to operate the same," so as to read:

SEC. 9. That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any factory, packing house, mine, or other plant, or any part thereof, in or through which any necessaries are or may be manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined, and to operate the same.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if the word "mine" as used there would cover the tin-plate industry. "Mine" would not cover the tin-plate industry in my opinion, and I should like to inquire if that industry could be reached by the word "factory."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The tin-plate industry was not mentioned in the committee at all, but I think it was intended to be broad enough to cover all of them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The tin-plate industry is very vital to the question of food conservation. As everyone knows, the world has become accustomed to the use of canned food in all forms. I was wondering whether the committee had this in mind.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee had not that particular industry in mind, but it was thought by the use of the word "mine" and the use of the word "factory" it would cover everything that the Government wanted to utilize for furnishing its supplies.

Mr. KENYON. I will ask the Senator from Michigan if that question would not be determined by the question whether necessaries as defined in the act include tin plate? The Senator will observe the language he refers to covers only those necessaries, and necessaries are defined in the act. I think it does not cover tin plate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Iowa. He has given a great deal of thought, and intelligent thought, to the bill. I desired simply to raise the question whether tin plate used in the making of cans, which play such an important part in the conservation and preservation of food products, ought not to be specifically included in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan if tin plate as ordinarily used in the form of cans is not an iron or steel product? We find in section 1 of the bill steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, and so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can not quite agree that either steel or iron would necessarily include tin.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The reason why I asked the Senator the question is that I thought tin was really a veneer, and the bill includes iron or steel products. It would be impossible to make tin cans without the base of the cans, which undoubtedly would be an iron or steel product.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like very much, if we are aiming directly at that particular feature, to see the language which has just been read so broadened as to include the containers of food products, inserting after the words "food products" the words "and containers therefor."

Mr. KING. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that if there should be any doubt in his mind as to whether the word "containers" and the words "steel and iron" are sufficient to cover tin it could be reached by amending the first section by adding after the words "steel and iron" the word "tin."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] calls my attention to an amendment recently made by the committee in the language just stated, which, of course, does cover cans used as food containers, that are so vital and necessary to the preservation of food.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 22, after the word "the," to strike out "amount" and insert "compensation"; in line 24, after the word "paid," to insert "75 per cent of"; in the same line, after the word "amount," to strike out "prescribed" and insert "so determined"; on page 13, line 2, before the word "will," to strike out "the amount paid" and insert "said 75 per cent"; in the same line, after the word "will," to insert "make up such amount as will"; in line 8, after the word "including," to strike out "the operation of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof"; in line 12, after the word "employees," to insert: "Provided, That whenever any person or persons entitled to receive such wages are dissatisfied with the rate of wages so fixed by the President, he or they shall have the right to have the reasonableness of such wages reviewed and determined by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation created by the act approved July 15, 1913; and in case said board shall conclude that a higher rate of wages shall be allowed their finding shall be conclusive in the premises, and said board shall prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this proviso into effect," so as to read:

Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, is not essential for the national security or defense, the same shall be restored to the person entitled to the possession thereof. The United States shall make just compensation, to be determined by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, and operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof. If the compensation so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code. The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for carrying out the purposes of this section, including the purchase, sale, or other disposition of articles used, manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined therein, and the employment, control, and compensation of employees: Provided, That whenever any person or persons entitled to receive such wages are dissatisfied with the rate of wages so fixed by the President, he or they shall have the right to have the reasonableness of such wages reviewed and determined by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation created by the act approved July 15, 1913; and in case said board shall conclude that a higher rate of wages shall be allowed their finding shall be conclusive in the premises, and said board shall prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this proviso into effect.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator who is in charge of the bill, in view of the fact that the committee thinks it necessary to provide a board of appeals to adjust any inequalities or wrongs that may be done in the matter of wages, why a similar board ought not to be created to adjust the matter of prices in the case of a mistake being made in prices?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there was any suggestion of that kind made to the committee. The proposition was made to insert this provision in the bill with reference to the regulation of wages, applying the law of July 15, 1913, to the act. It was discussed at some length in committee, and the committee by a majority vote inserted it in the bill. I do not think any proposition was made along the line suggested by the Senator from Missouri about an appeal board for the regulation of prices.

Mr. REED. I am asking the Senator not what the committee may have had before it, but I am asking the Senator now what his opinion is in regard to this matter? I agree it is perfectly proper if we undertake to regulate wages that there should be some opportunity afforded for the wage earner to have a hearing before some kind of a board, and I see no objection to the one named in the bill, but if that is to be accorded to the man who works for wages, why should not a similar protection be put in the bill for the man who raises wheat or corn or cotton? Why should he be left without any right of appeal or any board of arbitration to determine the justice of any price that may have been fixed by some other authority?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator suggest any concrete proposition on the subject?

Mr. REED. If the Senator has in mind the suggestion I was endeavoring to present, I am suggesting now something which I think is along that line.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Senator whether provision has not already been made in the bill for a board in the matter of prices?

Mr. REED. I think not.

Mr. WALSH. I think there is a provision that if the party who accepts 75 per cent is not satisfied the jury shall fix it.

Mr. REED. That is not the matter that I am speaking of. That is where something is taken over by the Government. I am speaking about the effect of the bill upon the prices of farm products. I claim——

Mr. WALSH. The bill provides for the taking of farm products, not from the farmer but from others, and it provides that a board—namely, the jury—shall determine the price. Would the Senator prefer to have an appointive board to determine the price instead of having it determined by the jury?

Mr. REED. The Senator is talking about one thing and I am talking about a different thing. I would rather have a jury decide any question for me than any board on earth. But the proposition I am discussing is this: The effect of this when it is all taken together, in my judgment, is absolutely to deprive the farmer of any free and open market for the surplus farm products of the country, and his price will in fact be fixed by the price which is fixed by the representatives of the allies and of neutral nations and of our own country buying in the market the surplus products. That, together with the fact that an embargo will be placed upon all shipments, except those which go through the particular channels just indicated, amounts to a fixing of the price, and in connection with that there is the fixing of a minimum price which may and may not prove high enough. I think those questions ought to be left to some board or tribunal where there is an opportunity to be heard. That is the reason why I suggested to the Senator in charge of the bill, that if the right is given to the wage earner whose wages have been fixed to have an arbitration, some similar plan ought to be devised to protect the farmer.

Mr. WALSH. I was simply endeavoring to ascertain just exactly what feature of the bill was to be modified so as to provide for fixing it by a board. The President is authorized to go out and buy and fix the price, and an appeal is authorized from that to a jury. What is the other provision of the bill in respect to which the Senator feels a like amendment ought to be incorporated?

Mr. REED. I tried to make myself understood. The bill contains a provision allowing the President to enter the market and buy, through some agent of course, and as to that I am making no complaint. I take it that purchasing power will be exercised for the purpose of keeping the market from going too low. The bill contains a provision also for fixing minimum prices to the farmer. No human foresight can enable anyone to fix that price so that it will cover all exigencies which may arise. For instance, the minimum price is fixed based upon an average crop, yet it may transpire that there is only half a crop, in which event the minimum price will be of no use whatever. That is one thing that I think is entitled to be considered.

The other proposition that I submit is that there are within the bill provisions which I think amount to an absolute control of the farmer's prices found in the fact that an embargo can be declared, and it is understood that one will be declared. That takes away the foreign market, the market for the entire surplus of farm products.

In addition to that, the products sold to the allies are now to be marketed through a common agency; and it is understood that some common agency will probably purchase all of the goods that are to be shipped abroad, whether to the allies or to neutral countries. If that board or agency should fix a price which is too low, it inevitably would result injuriously to the farmer, because, of course, the price paid for the surplus must affect the whole of the crop.

The question I am now asking is, Whether, if we are going to safeguard the wages of labor—and I agree that is proper—there ought not to be some board to which the producer might appeal for a rectification of prices which may be fixed in the manner I have indicated? I think that is worthy of consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to submit a few observations——

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow an interruption for me merely to submit an amendment to the revenue bill and introduce a few other bills to be printed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would be in violation of the rule, and the Chair is compelled to enforce the rule. The Senator having the floor may not be interrupted for the purpose of introducing bills or making reports other than conference reports.

Mr. FLETCHER. With the consent of the Senator having the floor, I suppose it could be done, for it has been done all the time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to enforce the rule, regardless of the action of any Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am perfectly willing that the rule shall be enforced. I only hope it will be enforced as to others as well as myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been trying to enforce the rule now for two months.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to submit some observations on what is known as the liquor amendment, or section 12, of this bill before we come to a vote upon it. I shall not pause, Mr. President, to discuss any legal question which may be involved in the amendment. If there be a constitutional or legal question involved in it, it is the same that is involved in the entire measure. The amendment adds no new legal proposition to the bill, and any observations which I have to make upon that question will be made in connection with the legal question which may be involved in the measure as a whole.

I do not support section 12 because of the fact alone that it is a food-conservation matter. I have no doubt that it is an important food-conservation measure; but that is not solely my reason for supporting it. I support it also because I look upon it as a conservation measure relating to human efficiency and to human life. The two propositions, to my mind, are intertwined and interlaced and inseparable. It might be said that the food-conservation question carries with it all others; and if so, one could well say that he supports it for that reason alone; it relates not only to the question of the conservation of food but it relates also, in my opinion, to the question of efficiency of the human system and the conservation of human energy.

Mr. President, a few years ago in a western State, during some labor troubles, it became necessary to invoke martial law. Martial law was invoked and extended over a very large portion of the State, a portion of the State in which thousands of men were in the employ of mine operators and of other owners of industries. It was a very extraordinary situation, one in which riot and crime for a time held almost complete sway. Before those who had charge of the situation could even begin to restore order and law it became necessary to close the saloons and drinking places in that district, and, under the authority of martial law, every saloon and every place where intoxicating liquors were sold or could be had were closed. They remained closed, and the prohibition of the sale and of the drinking of liquor remained in force for many months.

I had an opportunity to observe personally the effect of that upon that entire district, upon the workingmen in the district, upon the industries, and upon the efficiency which it brought to labor. The homes underwent a change which it would be very difficult for language to portray. When night came the laboring man did not remain at the saloon or upon the streets, but he went to his home. When Saturday night came he did not spend the evening in the saloon, but he returned to his home and took his week's pay with him. When he left his home upon Monday morning it was an entirely different home to what he had been in the habit of leaving while the saloons were open. The transformation was simply marvelous.

It is true that there were some complaints at times, but it was not long until all, both those engaged in toil and those employing labor, realized the beneficial effect of it.

The experience which we had there in the few months while those saloons were closed was one of the most potent factors in the cause of absolute prohibition in that State. I had not myself prior to that time been what you would call a radical advocate of the prohibition cause, but I became so by reason of my opportunity of witnessing with my own eyes the effect upon the labor world of taking liquor out of the laborers' lives. It was not by reason of any theory, but by reason of example, as to the effect of which and the importance of which and the significance of which there could be no doubt.

I think I shall recall another instance. A few years ago one of the great timber syndicates purchased an exceedingly large tract of land in a Western State, and determined to erect in the midst of it what was then to be the largest sawmill in the world. They were practical business men; they had no fads or fancies, and no theories about prohibition, but they consulted their attorney as to how they could protect their plant in that State, which was then not "dry." They did it as a business proposition, for the purpose of protecting them against injury and damage suits, and for the purpose of insuring efficiency among their men; simply, if I may use the phrase, as a cold business proposition, the same as they had put their money into timber and for the same reason that they were sawing it into lumber. After consultation with their attorney it was determined, as they were the owners of the land for miles about, they would not sell it at all, but that they would lease it for 99 years, with a forfeiture clause in case of the sale or the use of liquor upon the premises.

The result of it was that they dedicated that large body of land, or that large space of country, in the midst of what was then an "open" State to prohibition. It became the most perfect hive of industry that it has ever been my privilege to see. There never has been a strike in the institution, and I am told, although it is an organized town, now having a population of some seven or eight thousand, that there has never been what is sometimes called a professional agitator in the town for any length of time. I made it my business upon one occasion while there to visit the homes of the workingmen who were in the employ of this great institution, and I was only confirmed in my hitherto formed opinion as to the desirability of eliminating the liquor traffic in its entirety from the labor world; that it not only brought efficiency and greater service to the employer but it was of incalculable worth to the employee. It resulted in building up a different kind and a different class of homes; it gave the community happier families, better clothed and educated children.

These observations, Mr. President, lead me to say, in support of this amendment, that it is not a question alone of conserving food; it is a question of building up efficiency and conserving and utilizing man power not only for the purpose of war but for the great industrial strife which will come when this war shall have closed.

I feel, sir, that a vast amount of this day dreaming, in which we are indulging, as to what will be the attitude of this Nation toward this or that nation, and all the nations toward other nations when this war closes, will be dissipated within a few years after the war shall have ceased, and we will witness again, if the human family continues to be in the future what it has been in the past, the same tremendous strife for industrial supremacy, only a thousandfold stronger, when the organization which has followed as the result of this war is considered. In that great industrial contest, in that great strife, I am just as anxious to see the American laboring man rid of this great evil as I am at this hour when his efficiency and his strength may be necessary for the preservation of his country.

Mr. President, a short time ago martial law was declared in a part of Montana; and the same thing followed with reference to prohibition of liquor in that State, which at that time was not "dry," as in the cases to which I have referred.

I have not the figures before me. I heard the figures stated, however, by the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] a short time ago as to the decrease in the number of injuries and in the number of deaths which resulted in the mines during the time when the use of liquor was entirely prohibited among the people; and, while I am unable now to give the figures, they struck me at that time as being most extraordinary and exceptional. They teach a lesson which ought to nerve every lawmaker to do his duty in this hour. They tell us a tale that ought to make every friend of labor put aside once and for all this cowardly, cruel plea that to leave the liquor traffic in the open and practically free is to favor labor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho pardon an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. I wish to supplement what the Senator from Idaho is saying by stating that I had occasion recently to make some investigation in the State of Arizona as to the increased efficiency of the laboring man in the mines and the fewer accidents since prohibition went into effect in that State, and my observations are in accord with the statement just made by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator. The Statistical Abstract of the United States shows that during the year 1913, 25,000 men suffered such accidents in the industrial field as resulted in death in the United States alone, not including railroad accidents, and that during that year 700,000 men were injured in such a way as to be temporarily, and in some cases permanently, incapacitated.

Mr. President, if it be true, as has been demonstrated, I think, in the incidents related in a small and circumscribed way, that one of the contributing causes to these accidents, which are so numerous, resulting in the death of 25,000 men in one year and the injury of 700,000 others—if it be true that liquor is one of the great contributing causes, it occurs to me that we can well base our support of this amendment upon other propositions than that of mere food conservation alone.

I referred yesterday to an article printed a few days ago purporting to state the results of limited prohibition in England during the war. The article purports to come from a member of the commission which is charged with that matter in England. He says:

> Great economies have been effected by the restrictive measures adopted and great things have been accomplished in the release of man power for the war and the increase of efficiency in all activities. Further restrictions are almost certain to come soon, and it is a safe prophecy that eventually total prohibition will be voted.

Further quoting, he says:

> Before the war 34,000,000 standard barrels of beer had been brewed yearly, a supply just about sufficient to meet the demand. The Asquith government passed the restricting act cutting the brewing output to 26,000,000 barrels. When the new government was formed the output was cut to 18,000,000 barrels, and then to 10,000,000. This dates from April 1, and the output includes the supply to the military forces. In grain this means a saving of over 1,000,000 tons yearly.
>
> On February 20 last an order was issued stopping the malting of barley. Now, there is no imported barley used in brewing. The brewers are using the stocks of barley already malted before February, and these will last them until next autumn.

* * * * * * *

The results of this restriction are conclusively shown in the decrease in the number of convictions for drunkenness. In greater London and 36 boroughs in England and Wales, with a population of over 100,000 each, there were 118,267 convictions in 1913 and 52,783 in 1916. Of these 98,115 were men and 28,352 were women in 1913, and 36,711 men and 16,072 women in 1916. In Glasgow there were 5,863 convictions during the first four weeks of 1915 and 3,153 for the same period in 1917. Deaths due to alcoholism in England and Wales decreased from 1,831 in 1913 to 953 in 1916.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to an article in the Washington Post which I think perhaps might be considered along with the figures he has just given. It is very short, and I will read it.

LONDON, July 5, 1917.

Andrew Bonar Law, chancellor of the exchequer, announced in the House of Commons to-day that the Government had decided to permit the brewing during the quarter ending September 30 next, of an additional amount of beer not exceeding 33⅓ per cent of the amount already allowed for that quarter.

This action, he said, was taken owing to the greater consumption during the summer months and the difficulties caused by shortage in large centers of population and in the counties where crops are being harvested.

I was just wondering why they ordered more beer under the circumstances that the Senator has described.

Mr. BORAH. Possibly for the same reason and under the same influence that the Senate will adopt this amendment offered as substitute for section 12 of the House bill.

I read further:

The liquor board in its latest report says: "There has been a heavy, rapid fall in convictions for drunkenness which, following upon the operation of the board's earlier orders, has been again consistently maintained. Incidentally, it may be noted that this fact goes far to invalidate the suggestion that the sudden fall in the convictions for drunkenness in the areas mentioned have been largely due to the withdrawal of men for the army.

CONVICTIONS OF WOMEN DECREASE.

"Confirmatory disproof of this suggestion has also been found in figures of the convictions of women, which had decreased nearly in the same ratio as the convictions of men. It is gratifying also to observe that the predictions of reaction have been falsified and, speaking generally, the decrease of the convictions in the areas scheduled more than a year ago or 18 months ago has been well maintained and in many instances has progressed appreciably."

There is more to this article, Mr. President, which I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The liquor board denies the statement that drinking in the home has increased since the restrictions were placed on public houses, and has examined many allegations to this effect and invariably found that few have been substantiated by facts. On the other hand, medical officers and health officers report that home drinking is decreasing.

MINERS' VIEW OF PROHIBITION.

Here is another side. The secretary of the Northumbrian miners said: "We have been told the Government is afraid workingmen would resist prohibition. That might be true in times of peace and even in time of war were our foodstuffs abundant, but to suggest that workingmen faced with a choice such as they now face between beer and bread would choose beer is such a reflection on the character and intelligence of the workingman that I for one repudiate the suggestion.

"The great majority of workingmen like their glass of beer and whisky, and some of them sometimes take more than is good for them. But make no mistake, when the pinch of hunger comes and their wives and children have to go on short food beer will have to go without any question whatever."

Mr. BORAH. I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter which I have from Camden, N. J., the portion of it which I think is proper to go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

JUNE 29, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Camden has 500 acres under cultivation in 10,000 city gardens in order to increase the world's store of food. Hundreds of people in this city are now already underfed because of high prices, and unless every available pound of foodstuff is conserved for the winter's supply the home guards of our cities will have to quell food riots before another crop is gathered.

It would be biting irony to allow foodstuff to be wasted in manufacturing that which men use to unleash the animal within them when the urgency for its conservation is so great and the need to keep the passions strictly under the control of reason is so urgent. And it would eternally blot American statesmanship to continue such manufactured waste in the face of the threatened food shortage, which our brave boys, my only son among them, may find the only unconquered enemy which may bring defeat and disaster upon them and the cause for which they fight. When they left home and native land to help make the world safe for democracy they looked to those in authority to make fighting safe for them.

In the name of God and the country, and for the sake of our sons on foreign soil as well as the crouching poor, I ask that you favor the prohibition of the use of all foodstuff in the manufacture of intoxicants for the period of the war. Grapes can be profitably used in grape juice.

With best wishes, I am, trustingly,
Yours, for humanity,

ZED H. COPP,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. BORAH. I ask permission also to insert as a part of my remarks a very powerful editorial from the North American.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia North American.]

LIQUOR'S FIGHT FOR LIFE.

In his discussion the other day of liquor in relation to the national defense, Prof. Irving Fisher remarked that it was "nip and tuck" with the question in Washington. "Every day," he said, "I find that the situation has mysteriously shifted."

The aptness of the comment will appeal to every observer. On June 4 the rum interests won a substantial victory when the Senate Committee on Finance, in order to sidetrack the general demand for complete prohibition during the war, recommended the levying of prohibitive taxes merely upon distilled spirits, leaving the beer and wine industries untouched. On June 23 the House, with only five negative votes, passed the food-administration bill, including these two drastic amendments: Absolutely prohibiting the use of food materials in the making of any alcoholic beverages during the war, and authorizing the President to commandeer the present stocks of distilled liquors.

As we have often remarked, there has never been a change in American public affairs comparable in force and rapidity to the progress of the war against liquor. "Despite the efforts of the liquor interests and the political machines," we said eight months ago, "this question has quietly and irresistibly thrust itself into the forefront of our public affairs, there to remain until it is settled and settled right." Two years before that we declared that it was even then "the greatest single issue of the day." It is still the overshadowing problem of legislation, for it has become vital in the program which means national defeat or victory, and it is forcing its way to settlement over the desperate defense of the liquor interests and the tacit opposition of the administration itself.

Expulsion of the liquor evil from American life has long been inevitable. During many years moral sentiment built up against it a steadily increasing pressure of condemnation, but when to this was added the force of economic and scientific testimony, impressed upon the public mind in the records of actual experience, the combination was irresistible. At last November's election 4 States voted themselves dry, making 24 in all, and the achievement of a rum-free Nation was only a question of time.

Enormous impetus had been added to the movement, of course, by the convincing lessons of the war. In the supreme test of human efficiency and endurance the nations learned that they could not defend themselves, could not survive the implacable ordeal, while their vigor and their resources were depleted by alcoholic indulgence. The conviction already reached by the majority of Americans gained unnumbered adherents because of the demonstration in Europe that enslavement to drink meant national enfeeblement and military disaster.

Then, with the entrance of the United States into the conflict, came the final and unanswerable argument—the world-wide shortage of food, the imperative need that the American people conserve the supplies which alone can overcome the deficiency, and the urgent command to eliminate every wasteful practice, even to the revolutionizing of the diet and kitchen economy in the American household. The issue had become "bread or booze," and from the time that was made clear the judgment of the Nation was sure.

So long ago as January, 1914, a constitutional amendment providing for national prohibition won a majority in the House, although less than the necessary two-thirds. But it was the proof which the war gave of alcohol's deadening and debauching effects which put behind the prohibition movement its strongest single influence. At the last national election it not only swept four States, but was potent in changing the political map in many others, liquor Members of Congress and liquor governors and legislatures being displaced.

All the adroit maneuvering of the rum interests and their allies could not keep the issue from challenging the ensuing Congress, and prohibition won two notable victories—the District of Columbia was made dry and the shipment of liquor and the mailing of liquor advertisements into prohibition States was made unlawful after July 1 next.

No sooner had the present session begun than the question became dominant again. The House Democratic caucus declared for national prohibition, but reversed the action in one of those "mysterious shifts," this one being due to a plea that the administration should initiate such legislation. The Senate went through a similar contradictory procedure, adding to the espionage bill, and later eliminating, a provision forbidding the use of food in liquor manufacture.

These checks seemed only to invigorate the purpose of those who wanted the Nation to fight with unimpaired strength, and they kept up a "drumfire" of antirum bills, resolutions, and amendments under which the liquor defenses began to crumble. No important bill reached the floor without a determined attempt to fasten upon it some sort of rider that would free the Nation's energies from the hampering evil.

One by one these projects were struck down, not so much because of the liquor lobby's persistent efforts as because of the disfavor of the administration. President Wilson and his subordinates studiously avoided any indorsement of war prohibition, and their attitude was so well understood that even Democratic leaders who were for the principle—such as Chairman LEVER, in charge of the food-administration bill—discouraged the movement as threatening harmony.

But against the overshadowing fact of the food shortage, emphasized in countless official utterances and news reports, all these adverse forces were powerless. President Wilson, Cabinet members, crop experts, and other well-equipped persons conducted a nation-wide campaign to convince the people that this country faced an alarming deficiency in foodstuffs; that America, even at the cost of privation, must sustain its allies; that unless production were increased enormously and wasteful methods in distribution and consumption corrected, conditions would become serious, even critical.

The campaign was a brilliant success. Never were Americans so rapidly or so thoroughly convinced of anything as they were that food was insufficient and misuse of it threatened dire consequences. Waste, in particular, became a prominent theme; and when powerful official discourses were delivered upon kitchen inefficiency, cheaper standards of diet and the necessity for using as food materials commonly discarded as garbage, public scrutiny of the far-reaching question of waste became intent.

Then some one said "bread or booze?" and started a prairie fire. Americans were ready to admit that they should eat less and modify their tastes in diet and watch their potato parings, but there was no way of estimating such savings; and before their eyes they had, in a single item, the diversion of nearly 100,000,000 bushels of grain every year from food to intoxicating liquor—11,000,000 loaves of bread daily kept from the tables of the American people, with "war bread" and food cards threatened.

In vain the liquor interests pleaded that theirs was a "great" industry, and that it must help to pay for the war, and that in any event the grain used to make booze was only a minute part of the total yield. Too long they had boasted of their stupendous services to agriculture—how they used grain equal to the entire crop of Maine, Connecticut, Delaware, Nevada, New Mexico, and Wyoming; how they guaranteed prosperity to 300,000 farmers; how their shipments amounted to 2½ per cent of the railroad traffic furnished by all manufacturing industries. The people remembered these arguments and refused to consider the wasting of 100,000,000 bushels of cereals and thousands of tons of sugar products "negligible."

So the liquor men concentrated on Congress, and three weeks ago they exulted in having won a profitable compromise in the Senate committee's plan to stop the distillery business by prohibitive taxation and continue the far greater consumption of foodstuffs in making wine and beer.

But this device was ineffective, and once more the advocates of liquor betrayed themselves. They urged vehemently that it would be fatal to prohibit the manufacture of wines and beer, because there were nearly 300,000,000 gallons of spirits in bond which would take the place of the "harmless" beverages. "You will force the man who wants a glass of beer to drink whisky," they said. "You will make moderate drinkers drunkards." Whereupon the people replied that the logical and necessary course was to eliminate both dangers, which they are about to do, unless the overwhelming decision of the House should be defied by the Senate or blocked by administration influence.

Last Saturday's action shows that this has become a fight to the death. Every compromise scheme was voted down, the administration proposal leaving the matter to the discretion of the President, the exemption of beer and light wines, and the substitution of halfway regulations. Special privilege for the breweries was defeated by a vote of 134 to 124. A motion to strike out the prohibition clause was lost, 152 to 136. The administration's discretionary section was displaced, 132 to 114. And in the end the vote was 365 to 5 for the food bill with the provision, "No person shall use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcoholic beverages." In addition seizure of distilled spirits now available was authorized.

A desperate drive is under way to swing the Senate against this decisive judgment, but in that body there has been from the beginning a strong section of opinion for war prohibition, and it will not grow weaker.

And the great change, if it becomes effective, will not be temporary. As a fact, it is not prohibition for the term of the war that the rum interests fear most: it is the overpowering demonstration which that would give to the moral and economic and financial gain to be derived from final extinction of the liquor traffic. As Prof. Fisher said: "When 80 per cent of our national area, 60 per cent of our population, the National Capital, and the Army and Navy are under prohibition, it seems the logical thing to make it nation wide." And no less logical to make it permanent.

Liquor stands condemned by moral sentiment, by economic experience, by scientific knowledge, and by the relentless test of the Nation's need in war. Let the people once become habituated to the benefits of a saloonless nation and it will be impossible to revive the evil system after peace comes, when the fierce competition of the released nations will demand from the people of this country intense application and a standard of efficiency which will tolerate no such worthless and wasteful indulgence.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to call attention briefly to an article in the Atlantic Monthly by the dean of the College of Agriculture of the University of Illinois, touching directly upon this question of food conservation. The article says, in the beginning:

Because figures are such treacherous factors in all discussion, and because statements so conflicting have been published, it may be well to remark in advance that all estimates of the grain supply are based upon the latest reports of the International Agricultural Society of Rome, the hightest existing authority on world production. As the yields given are for cleaned wheat or for flour in terms of wheat, they are 5 to 10 per cent lower for that particular grain than are other figures frequently published.

The figures giving the amount of grain consumed in the manufacture of liquors are taken from an unsigned article on "Agriculture and the liquor industry," appearing in the yearbook of the United States Brewers' Association for 1914. Inasmuch as the purpose of the article in question was to show how important to farmers is this form of consumption, the figures may be assumed to be authentic, while the source of information can not be questioned.

Further, it says:

When last season's crop is compared with the average for the five years before the war it is found to be fully 200,000,000 bushels short—an illustration of the fact that variations as high as 25 per cent may be due to season alone.

* * * * * * *

These declines may well cause alarm, for they can not easily be recovered in countries engaged actively in war, with a large proportion of the population withdrawn from industry, especially where the usual supply of fertilizers is unobtainable, either because of lack of transportation or because of shortage in materials. The world's wheat supply, therefore, must be written down as permanently unsatisfactory during and for a considerable period after the war, except as America may be able notably to increase her production.

* * * * * * *

The yearbook cited gives the consumption in the form of dollars, based upon the average farm values as determined by the United States Department of Agriculture. Computing backward from these prices for the period in question, the consumption in bushels is as follows:

	Fermented.	Distilled.	Total.
Barley	96,803,882	6,057,646	102,861,528
Corn	22,655,260	22,087,756	44,743,016
Rye		7,262,580	7,262,580
Wheat	1,046,557	2,837	1,049,394

Here are nearly 156,000,000 bushels of grain removed from the food supply. Prodigious as these figures are, and while they cover 58 per cent of all the barley raised in the United States and over 17 per cent of all the rye produced, they account for less than 2 per cent of the corn crop and only one-eighth of 1 per cent of the wheat. Does the use of this amount of grain for brewing, therefore, mean a consumption sufficiently serious to attract attention from an economic point of view?

Measured against the tremendous total of the grain crops of the United States, this amount seems insignificant. But in cases of this kind it is not totals but margins that must be considered. In the budget of a big business, for example, any single item seems negligible when compared with the total; but that total is made up of many items, most of which are fixed charges against the business, leaving but little free money for open use. Just so with food products. The millions of mouths that must be fed and the millions more that are coming on constitute a fixed charge against our food supply that will leave at any one time only a small free margin that may be devoted to other purposes with any degree of safety. Let us, therefore, consider that margin.

Mr. Lubin, the American representative in the International Institute of Agriculture already mentioned, estimates that the world is short about 130,000,000 bushels of grain, again exclusive of the supply of the central powers. Now, it is this small shortage that raises the price and makes all the trouble, for it is this that constitutes the difference between abundance and scarcity, between comfort and distress, between safety and danger. This margin, therefore, needs attention.

* * * * * * *

Reference to the table will show that this world shortage of 120,000,000 bushels of grain is more than covered by the amounts consumed in the manufacture of liquors in the United States alone. Does not this afford the most ready means of recovering that shortage with both speed and certainty? Is it wise, is it statesmanlike, to continue to consume grain in this way, in the face of a real shortage of food, when even slight margins may constitute all the difference between success and failure in the great struggle that is upon us? The war will turn not upon the fact that some 39,000,000 men are under arms but upon some slight advantage that one side may gain over the other, and no advantage is more important than a safe margin of food.

Another reference to the table will serve to show that it is the fermented rather than the distilled liquors that call for the greatest consumption of grain in the liquor business. That is to say, about 120,000,000 bushels—or approximately the world shortage—are used for fermented liquors, against some 35,000,000 bushels, practically none of which is wheat, used for distillation.

But it is a different matter when we consider fermented liquors. Here are 120,000,000 bushels of grain, partly wheat, all destroyed so far as food values go, except for minor by-products for the feed lot. This is approximately the amount of the world's shortage, and in that sense it is large and exceedingly significant.

There are other paragraphs which I ask leave to put into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

To transport the grain now used for fermented liquor in the United States alone would require the entire fleet of a thousand wooden ships, such as are now contemplated for the war trade. This 120,000,000 bushels of grain is the equivalent of over half the wheat crop of France or of Canada, and it is twice that of England. It represents the entire grain food of over 15,000,000 people, and that is no negligible amount. It represents in the form of meat no less than 750,000,000 pounds, or the carcasses of more than a million of the heaviest beeves. With people starving abroad, with large sections of Europe desolate, and with food riots beginning in this country as a result of high prices, there can be but one answer to the question whether this wastage shall continue.

Now, it so happens that the same number of the Brewers' Yearbook contains an article on "The economic importance of the liquor business," in which it is shown that this business affords direct employment to some 500,000 men, and indirectly to as many more. To quote the final sentence, "Thus we may reckon on a total of considerably over a million who are dependent for wages upon the manufacture and sale of liquor. If their dependents are considered, a grand total of about 4,000,000 persons is involved."

Here it is frankly stated, as an economic asset, that practically 1 person out of every 25 in the United States is devoted to the liquor business and dependent upon it for support. Can we afford at any time, much less now, so heavy a draft from an unproductive industry, particularly one that subsists by the destruction of necessary food?

Here again the count is chiefly against the fermented liquors, which consume the bulk, not only of the grain, but also of the labor involved both in the manufacture and in trade. Clearly it is the fermented liquor that economic necessity will first attack.

A principal point made in the article first cited from the Brewers' Yearbook is that the liquor business consumes grain equal in value to the total crops grown in the States of Maine, Connecticut, Delaware, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico, and Wyoming combined. Rhode Island might have been added, still leaving a balance of some seven or eight millions of dollars to be accounted for. Under present conditions this is surely no sustaining argument. Here is the entire crop output of eight States, great and little, consumed in ways other than for food. More than four-fifths of this consumption serves no useful purpose in the arts or sciences, and at the best caters to an appetite that takes bread from children and support from wives and mothers by the thousands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, these facts and figures have been gathered from sources which seem entirely accurate and reliable; and they disclose that that which is estimated as being the world's shortage of food is the amount which we, as a single Nation, are permitting to be utilized each year in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. If, Mr. President, these fermented liquors when manufactured and put into use served any good purpose, or were helpful in any way, one could well reason that we ought not to change the program. But when we take into consideration the fact that the manufacture of these liquors not only deprives the world of its margin of food which is necessary for it to have in order to prevent actual and necessary want, but it undermines and destroys to a certain extent the other great source of power in this fight, the man power of the country, it seems to me that we ought at this time to consider both these propositions; and when they are put together and linked together there is no disputing the assertion that if we are for efficiency, for strength, for supreme power, we must close the institutions which consume both our food and our men. Does anyone dispute these figures? Does anyone claim that food is not a supreme issue? Does anyone claim that when you transform it into intoxicating drinks it serves humanity in any way? We are told that it will result in the destruction of property, but that must come sooner or later; like slavery, it must go. It will not be permitted to forever curse the family of man and the sacrifice must come.

Mr. President, I believe the liquor traffic of this country is near its final doom. Powerful influences may procrastinate the hour, but the hour nevertheless approaches. It is in the hour of execution, however, that we hear singular and surprising pleas for commutation. It is then that ingenuity searches the realm of conjecture for some possible fancy upon which to hang a claim for mercy. We have an example of this here and now in this plea for the workingman, who, they say, must have his beer, otherwise he will strike and break his Government down even in the face of the enemy. And following hard upon this plea to favor labor is the plea that the Government must have more revenue. A great metropolitan paper in an ambitious editorial, pleading plaintively in one part of the editorial for the favor of the laboring man, says, in the close of the editorial, the Government must have $450,000,000 in the way of revenue from this traffic. Let us look upon this logic in all its hideous deformity. The average earnings for the laboring mar in this country are from $700 to $900 a year. Upon that sum in these times no man can rear a family in decency, no man can educate his children and fit them for citizenship in a Republic. Under such wages men live constantly on the ragged edge of want and in mortal dread of that illness which may leave them at the mercy of charity. Now, in the name of humanity, you will leave them their drink in order that you may more successfully take from the wife and children a little more in the way of taxes, that you may drive them a little nearer the edge of want, that you may handicap them a little more in their effort to get clothes and an education. You would pull $450,000,000 out of labor, out of the scant and meager homes of labor that you may be more merciful with the excess profits of war. It is not only a cold and brutal policy but it is a short-sighted and futile policy. It undermines and impoverishes and finally destroys that force with which we must ultimately win this war and maintain our supremacy as a Nation. It undermines and destroys that force which must win the war in our industrial conflict, which, as I have said, is to follow this war just so sure as one hour succeeds another. But more than that, the whole thing is unfounded and untrue. Labor will not strike for drink, labor and laboring men are not the trouble in this conflict. It is greed—the cold, conscienceless greed that stands in the way, nothing else, nothing more, nothing less.

Sir, another item: Last year the liquor bill of the United States amounted to $2,438,037,985. Our liberty loan completed for the present is $2,000,000,000. Our Red Cross subscription is $100,000,000. So we have at this time represented in the liberty loan and the Red Cross subscription $2,100,000,000, and we have in the other column, representing the amount expended for liquor in a single year, $2,438,037,985. View this question from any standpoint—from the standpoint of revenue, from the standpoint of food conservation, from the standpoint of human energy and human efficiency, from the standpoint of good citizenship, from the standpoint of success in the war—and the appeal comes to us here, representing this entire Nation now, at this time in connection with this question, to put our seal of disapproval upon the liquor traffic in its entirety.

Sir, our country has at last been drawn into this world conflict. We are now a part of it and it is not immodest in us to say that we are now the controlling part, the dominating factor. The final result will be determined by the way in which this Republic discharges this stupendous task, a task the like of which no people in the history of the world ever assumed before. Consciously and unconsciously our people are moving on to duty. We do not know what is ahead of us. But we do know that every ounce of energy, every form of human exertion, every particle of man power must be conserved for this fearful struggle. We do know that that which will weaken, that which will embarrass, that which will undermine and destroy citizenship is now the common enemy of freedom, for it is not too much to say that our civilization and our conception of government are in the balance. In such an hour and with such a task and at a time when the whole Nation is gripped with the spell of sacrifice and the resolve of duty, let us be bold enough and brave enough and patriotic enough to eliminate this common evil, an evil condemned alike by science, by morality, by religion, and even by the god of war. Why falter, why compromise, why palter and dicker and barter with that which spreads poverty and want and disease in time of peace and disaster and defeat in time of war?

Mr. President, when we think of the fact, the indisputable fact, that drink weakens and demoralizes everything and everybody it touches, that it dissipates the energies and shatters the nerves of workingmen, that it causes indifference and carelessness and thereby brings on accidents with their thousands of widows and orphans; when we think of the wrecks, the disasters, the waste, the insanity, the crime which follow in the wake of this devilish thing; when we think of the jails, the prisons, the insane asylums filled by it and then reflect, upon the other hand, that only by our supreme strength and efficiency, by great economy of energy and human life, can we win; and when we think of the glory for all when we shall win, or the shame and humiliation should we fail, how in the name of our common country, in the name of all we have, can we withhold this final fatal blow to the enemy which has vexed and cursed us long enough. Let us strike now. A few for a time may complain, but countless millions throughout our land, in their happier homes, will bless the act and count it among the compensations of this great war.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, it will no doubt be conceded that I represent the strongest prohibition State in the Union. We have had longer, better, and more successful experience with the prohibitory liquor law than any other State. The benefits to us have been so great and the results so universally satisfactory that our convictions have become so strong on the subject that it has become a part of our religion. We believe it is one of the best laws upon our statutes, and it is the one law we would fight the hardest to retain. After 36 years of experience with the law, there is not 10 per cent of the people of the State who would consent to its repeal. On the question of war-time prohibition I believe that 99 per cent of the people of Kansas are demanding it. We are therefore practically unanimous in our opinion on this important subject. When I was elected to the Senate I pledged the people of Kansas to work and vote for any and all laws which would tend to bring about better prohibition conditions in my State as well as in the Nation, and I have frequently renewed that pledge, and as Senator have always endeavored to carry it out, and shall continue to do so as long as I am in the Senate. Therefore, by reason of that pledge and my duty and obligation thereunder to the people of my home State as well as to the people of the Nation, I shall support the most complete war prohibition measure that is possible to be enacted during this war.

When the question of the conservation of food products by preventing their manufacture into intoxicating liquors first arose it had my heartiest approval, and I was glad it was indorsed by Mr. Hoover, who has been selected by the President to administer this food-control law, and who is believed to be most able and competent to do so. It also seemed to have the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. Every expert on food regulations and plans for saving who testified before the Agricultural Committee, of which I am a member, sanctioned the advisability and necessity of saving this great food supply which unnecessarily goes into the manufacture of intoxicating liquors every day.

Therefore, in view of this sentiment and the apparent demand and necessity for the legislation, I prepared and, on the recommendation of those who believe as I do on this question, introduced Senate bill No. 2327, on May 21, 1917, which not only embraces the temperance view on this question but also the strongest conservation ideas, prohibiting absolutely the use of food products in the manufacture of any kind of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes during the war. I wish to insert this bill as a part of my remarks without reading:

A bill (S. 2327) further to provide for the support of the Army by the prevention of the waste of the food products of the United States during the period of war and to prohibit their manufacture into alcoholic liquors, except, in certain cases, to provide for the distillation of liquors in bond or heretofore manufactured, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to provide for the support of the Army and Navy by the prevention of the waste of all food products during the war with the Imperial German Government, it shall be unlawful during the period of such war for any person, firm, corporation, partnership, or association to use any such food products in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue a permit to any reputable and properly qualified person, firm, corporation, partnership, or association to manufacture alcohol from any such food products for munitions or any other purpose necessary to carry on the war, or intoxicating liquors for industrial, scientific, medicinal, or sacramental purposes under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of conserving the man power and resources of the Nation, and to increase the efficiency and safety of the Army and Navy, and the people throughout the country during such war, the manufacture, sale, gift, importation, or transportation in interstate commerce of any alcohol or alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

SEC. 3. That it shall be lawful for any person, firm, corporation, partnership, or association to use, manufacture, or redistill into alcohol for the manufacture of explosives, or other military, industrial, and scientific purposes any and all intoxicating liquors now in existence, or which may be manufactured or distilled prior to 30 days after the passage and approval of this act; and when such liquors are so used, manufactured, or redistilled, the tax thereon for beverage purposes, as now provided for, shall be waived, refunded, or credited on the amount of tax due on such liquors from the owner thereof, and such use, manufacture, or redistillation, and such waiver, refund, or credit shall be provided for under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

SEC. 4. That the President is hereby authorized to commandeer any such liquors so manufactured or redistilled for the purpose of supplying the needs of the Government in the prosecution of the war, and to pay such owner a reasonable compensation for the same. If the price so determined be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid the amount prescribed by the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation for such liquors in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

SEC. 5. That any person, firm, corporation, partnership, or association who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5 000, or by imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, the United States attorneys, United States marshals, their deputies and all other United States officers whose duty it is to enforce Federal laws, to carry the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

SEC. 6. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act shall be repealed to the extent of such inconsistency only.

Mr. President, I also introduced the bill as an amendment to the first food-control bill reported to the Senate, which was afterwards recommitted. The Agricultural Committee finally adopted the main features of the bill, except that the manufacture of wine was left to the discretion of the President should he find it necessary to conserve perishable fruits. This is the amendment which was originally reported by the committee and for which, on reconsideration, the Gore amendment was afterwards substituted by a very close vote in the committee. I voted against the substitute in the committee and shall vote against it in the Senate. I am favorable to the House provision known as the Barkley amendment, because it gives the greatest measure of food and man conservation and would beyond all question result in the greatest saving of all food products which enter into the manufacture of intoxicating liquor and fairly covers the ideas embraced in my own bill.

Mr. President, I believe in war-time prohibition on moral, economic, humanitarian, and patriotic grounds. As a war measure it has the approval not only of the countries with whom we are allied but also of the food administrator, the commanding officers of the Army and Navy, and many leading citizens of the United States.

As Lloyd-George said—

We are fighting Germany, Austria, and drink, and so far as I can see the greatest of these three deadly foes is drink. I have the greatest conviction, based on accumulating evidence, that nothing but root-and-branch methods would be of the slightest avail in dealing with the evil. I believe it is the general feeling that if we are to settle with German militarism we must first of all settle with liquor.

Ex-President Roosevelt said:

The world is facing a shortage of food. Therefore let us use all the grain we have for food and not for intoxicants. Now that the war is on, let us forbid any grain or corn being used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors.

Ex-Secretary of State William J. Bryan said:

I am in hearty sympathy with the effort to conserve the food supply by not allowing the bread supply to be shortened in order to lengthen the supply of alcohol. It is not wise to starve the people in order to make them drunk.

Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, president of the National City Bank, of New York, the biggest bank in the country, said:

I strongly favor complete national prohibition. I believe we are facing a serious test of our national character and efficiency, and am firmly convinced that a national prohibition measure would be of transcendent importance in its effect upon the national spirit in conserving and increasing our food supply and in raising the efficiency of the Nation.

The man power released from the liquor industries could be directed into productive channels where the need for labor will be acute and thus be readily absorbed. The needs of the agricultural and industrial situation will make this a peculiarly opportune time to put through a national prohibition law with minimum shock to our economic machinery during the readjustment. The business interests involved should be fairly dealt with, but many of the plants can be readily converted to important industrial uses.

The plea that Government revenue will be seriously curtailed should not influence action, for prohibition will induce a national efficiency which will open new and far richer sources of revenue. I believe public opinion, particularly in the West, but slightly comprehends the seriousness of the test that this war will put us to.

A national prohibition measure would do much to wake up the people to a realization of what war means and demands.

Our own Maj. Gen. Wood, in a recent address in Little Rock, Ark., denominated "booze" the worst enemy to the Army and advocated war prohibition. He also said:

I am glad the twelfth division of the new national army is to be trained in Arkansas, a "bone-dry" State. That will eliminate three-fourths of our troubles. Whisky is the soldier's worst enemy.

A great deal has been said about the high price of coal, and the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has rendered a very valuable service to the country by exposing the methods by which the people of the country have been robbed by the coal operators, and his investigation before the Interstate Commerce Committee will no doubt result in the greatest good. But I have here a practical demonstration which shows the effect that prohibition alone would have on the production of coal, and consequently on the price, which I desire to read:

WHITE OAK COAL CO.,
McDonald, W. Va., October 22, 1915.

We have made a comparison for three months prior to June 29, 1914, and for three months subsequent thereto, combining the production of these days for all mines, and the result is shown in the tabulation below:

Two Saturday pay days and Mondays following saloons.

	Tons.
April	10,960.50
May	7,902.20
June	16,752 70
Total	35,615.40

Two Saturday pay days and Mondays following no saloons.

	Tons.
July	24,852.65
August	16,199.55
September	26,761.45
Total	67,813.65
	35,615.40
Increase	32,198.25

It will be noted that the increase is 32,198 tons in favor of "no saloons" in the period mentioned. It is safe to assume that the same rate of increase would be carried out on the corresponding four days of each month throughout the entire year, and if that be the case, the result would show an increased production per annum, due to the absence of liquor in the field, of 128,793 tons.

The production of our mines has increased considerably since that time. I believe that there are more men in the field than there have been for a number of years, all of which would go to combat the theory that it is impossible to secure and keep miners unless they can be regularly supplied with booze.

Yours, truly,

W. B. REED,
Chief Ac ountant.

Considering this question from the standpoint of food conservation alone, I firmly believe that this section is one of the most important in the bill. It is the one section where you can point absolutely, definitely, and certainly to an enormous saving. Practically every pound of foodstuffs that goes into intoxicating liquor is lost; nearly every dollar that is expended in its manufacture is lost, and every dollar that is expended in its purchase after manufacture is lost, and every hour of labor that is employed in its production is lost. The object of this bill is to save foodstuffs, save money, save productive energy, and to save manhood, in order to promote the highest efficiency among the people at home and the army at the front, to quickly and decisively settle this most horrible of all wars to the best interests of humanity, the United States, and the world. We need every pound of food. We need every dollar, and we need every man preserved in his highest physical and moral condition.

As this conflict rages, and the pinch of want becomes more and more perceptible, and the pangs of hunger are gradually felt more or less by everybody, and we are looking about for things to eat, and for the necessary force and energy to finally carry the awful struggle to a successful conclusion, would not 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs, which unnecessarily go into intoxicating liquor every year, be a godsend? Would not the energy requirements for a year of 7,000,000 men, about the necessary number that will eventually be in the field, which that great quantity of foodstuffs will supply, be a most welcome and important asset?

As the vast expense of the war increases and the resources of the country grow less, would not $146,000,000 expended for these foodstuffs which go into intoxicating liquor every year be most useful in the Treasury? Would not the $2,400,000,000 unnecessarily expended every year for intoxicating beverages saved for the purpose of carrying on the war be a most determining factor? It is estimated that the total cost of liquor to the Nation for a year is $5,945,096,500, nearly the amount of our present appropriations for the prosecution of the war. I desire here to insert as a part of my remarks the items which go to make up this stupendous sum, prepared by ex-President Eliot, of Harvard University, and Mr. W. G. Calderwood, executive secretary of War Prohibition Committee of Sixty, without reading:

CONSERVATION OF THE NATION'S MONEY ALSO NECESSARY IN WAR TIME.

Attention has been too exclusively directed to the need of conserving food for victory. Wars have been determined by financial resources oftener than by food supply.

What is the direct retail cost of drink to our people?

Ex-President Charles W. Eliot, of Harvard University, in a table quoted in the Union Signal, March 23, 1916, estimates the "annual liquor bill" of the United States at $2,200,000,000. This is a conservative estimate.

What is the indirect cost of drink as a producer of disease, death, crime, accidents, dependency, and inefficiency?

This can not be answered exactly, but is estimated in following table prepared by W. G. Calderwood, executive secretary of War Prohibition Committee of Sixty, and used in a speech by Representative CHARLES H. RANDALL, which explains the estimates in detail (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Appendix):

Loss on foodstuffs	$146,000,000
Loss of commercial value of 120,000 lives (destroyed yearly)	966,720,000
Loss time of 589,000 farmers and wage earners	539,000,000
Loss through crime, insanity, and poverty	93,377,500
Loss in production of wealth (by lowered efficiency)	2,000,000,000
Total indirect cost of drink	3,745,097,500
Add direct retail cost of liquors to people (President Eliot's estimate)	2,200,000,000
Total cost of liquors to the Nation	5,945,096,500

Should hunger stare us in the face and we were looking for bread would not 11,000,000 loaves of bread a day—enough to feed 20,000,000 of people at home, or the entire Army at the front abroad—be mighty welcome? It has been estimated that this would be the great saving from war-time prohibition alone. Mr. President, we do know what even a little saving will accomplish. A saving of 20 per cent in our flour consumption would increase wheat exports 100,000,000 bushels per annum, enough to supply the needs of one-fifth of our population, and an amount equal to our annual export before the war. Seven billion pounds of foodstuffs drunk up in intoxicating liquor reduced to bushels of grain amounts to about 120,000,000 bushels, which saving alone represents the world's shortage and might be the means of turning the scales of war. The saving of only 6 cents per day per capita in consumption or waste amounts to $2,000,000,000 per annum, the total of the liberty-bond issue. Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale College, says:

I am willing to stake my reputation as an economist on the assertion that with prohibition we could add at least 10 per cent to the annual income of the United States, which is forty-five billions of dollars.

An increase of 10 per cent in efficiency among the people at home as well as with the Army at the front by the nonuse of intoxicants might be the means of bringing about the greatest victory.

The saving of 120,000 lives annually by prohibition might furnish the army to bring complete victory and everlasting peace. Mr. Hoover, the food administrator, is calling upon the women of the country to look to the savings of the crumbs that usually fall from the table upon the floor. Does it require any argument to convince us that we should also look after saving the big things when we know where and how to put our hands upon them? Does not all this saving many times offset the loss of revenue or the individual loss to the breweries and distilleries? In the long run there would not be any loss to either. Every brewery and distillery could be almost immediately put to some profitable and legitimate use; and every man employed by these concerns would soon find better employment in some more stable and satisfactory business. Every thinking man knows that sooner or later the breweries and distilleries must go, and indeed many of them have already made arrangements to go, and why not let them all begin in earnest right now when the country needs the foodstuffs they unnecessarily consume and the men they needlessly employ? No; there is no further use to argue for booze as against bread, or for profits as against patriotism. The handwriting is already upon the wall, and even if complete war prohibition does not come now, it is admitted by all that old John Barleycorn has passed in his checks and is now to be buried so deep that he can never be resurrected when peace returns.

This is in itself a mighty big jump, but it is only halfway across the awful chasm through which the dark and bloody stream of waste, destruction, poverty, human suffering, misery, and death, caused by this iniquitous traffic, has been flowing in such terrible torrents for so many years. The other jump will be taken sooner or later, and a failure to take it now at the time of the country's greatest need will bring the wrath of the people down upon the liquor interests of the country so strongly that the rest of the fight will be easily won.

Mr. President, liquor stands condemned by the moral sentiment of the country, by scientific knowledge, by economic experience, and by the supreme patriotic test of the Nation's need in time of war. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] asked why the President did not call upon the brewers to quit this fight instead of upon the temperance people to yield temporarily on account of the importance of the early enactment into law of the other food provisions in this bill. The reason is clear. The President made his appeal to the patriotism of those he called upon. He knew there is no patriotism among the liquor interests of the country, for they would just as leave sell liquor under the Government of the Kaiser as under that of the President, and the chances are they would prefer to do so. There is no patriotism or humanity among men who destroy manhood and homes and who bring tears and suffering to women and little children daily for the almighty dollar. It is a cold-blooded, sordid question of dollars and cents with them. It is high time that "booze" should not be placed above bread or profits above patriotism. Let the people once become acquainted with the munificent benefits of a saloonless Nation and they will never return to the evil and iniquitous system when peace is declared.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the time for expeditious action by the Senate on the pending measure is so overwhelmingly apparent to us all that I shall be very brief in what I have to say this afternoon. I am quite sure that what I may say will not influence the vote of a single Senator. I am persuaded that the Senate has made up its mind on the various phases of the subjects treated in this bill and is ready for definite, final action. And I would not delay action for a moment. I am somewhat skeptical as to the good results that may flow from this legislation, but I know the country is expecting something of the kind, the President desires the power which the bill confers, and I trust that the matter may be enacted into law at the earliest possible moment. I was in hopes when the bill first came from the House that the Senate might adopt the House provision on the liquor question with a slight amendment. If I could have my way about it, I should amend the House bill by prohibiting the manufacture of wine, which is left discretionary with the President. I think Congress should legislate. However great and good the Executive may be, he has enough to engage all his time and talents looking after the executive department of the Government. In favoring the prohibition legislation proposed in this bill I am greatly rejoiced over the fact that I am in perfect accord with the wishes and sentiments of nine-tenths of the white people of the State of Mississippi. We have tried prohibition in Mississippi and find that it works well in time of peace, and I am very sure it will work infinitely better in time of war.

Mr. President, if I should say that I am surprised at the turn things have taken on this question I would not be altogether candid with the Senate. The events that have come or are about to happen "cast their shadows before," and I am prepared for this change of front on the part of the Senate on the liquor question. Feeling so deeply the importance of prompt radical action touching the regulation or absolute prohibition of the liquor traffic at this juncture of the Nation's history my heart bade me hope that the right thing, from my standpoint, might be done by the Senate, while at the same time my intellect doubted. When the mercenary missiles from the metropolitan press, especially the New York World—a sheet famed for the affluence of its mendacity and the endless variety of its conscienceless scurrility in its dishonest criticism of Congressmen who dare to act independently of the dictations of that saintly organ of misinformation that would—

Stamp God's own name on a lie just made
To turn a penny in the way of trade—

I repeat, when these missiles began to fly fast and furious through the mails and fill the air with forebodings of disaster which it urged would surely come when America got sober and the manufacturers of the drunk-making stuff should be induced by law to pursue an innocuous vocation, I confidently expected an early capitulation and surrender to the powers of evil. In that I am sorry to say I have not been disappointed. May I be permitted at this point, Mr. President, to express my regret that the President of the United States did not see fit to employ his virile, trenchent pen and withering sarcasm in holding up to the world the "little bunch of willful" proponents of the liquor traffic to the withering sareasm, scorn, and obliquy of an outraged public for their threatened efforts in the interest of vile liquor to prevent a speedy passage of the pending bill, which is so much desired at this time? But a different course was pursued by our honored President. He thought it, if not the best thing to do, the more easily attained probably to ask the prohibitionists to "blow off the hounds and quit the chase" that the bill might be passed even though it should carry no provision prohibiting this unfortunate and nefarious business.

There are two reasons or motives which move me in my advocacy of prohibition in this bill. First, for the conservation of food, and, second, to save the race—the Nation—from the pernicious moral effect of the saloon, and the deleterious effect of drinking intoxicating liquors. I am quite sure that what I may say will not prevent or hinder in any way the thing determined upon from being done. The order has gone forth. But I am going to ask the Senate to indulge me just a moment while I put into the RECORD a few facts, which I trust the American people may read and, after reading, understand. If the average man or woman capable of understanding the facts which I shall put into the RECORD shall look with any degree of tolerance upon the act of the Senate in surrendering to the liquor interests at this time, even though they were ordered by the President of the United States to do it, I shall marvel at the infinite charity which glorifies the heart of such a person.

I will not presume to sit in judgment upon the acts of other men, but if I should prove recreant to duty, if I should betray the cause of temperance when victory for nation-wide prohibition is within our reach, by voting to lay the question aside as a mere matter of expediency, I imagine that I would experience that peculiar sensation which must have filled the heart of poor, unfortunate Judas Iscariot just before perpetrating his last earthly act.

There is too much at stake—human souls, the happiness of homes; in a word, the well-being of society in this life and the life to come—for me to think of deserting the cause which I hold so dear to my own heart and of such vital interest to the people of America.

Prof. Irving Fisher, political economist of Yale University, states certain facts which can not be answered. He says:

"In 1916 the Federal Government received less than $250,000,000 as revenue from alcoholic liquors, and only $89,000,000 of this was from fermented liquors. This is less than 10 per cent of the subscriptions to the liberty loan, less than 5 per cent of a year's war expenditure.

"These taxes are paid by the consumer, who pays in addition $2,000,000,000, which the Government does not get and which is worse than wasted. The Nation loses annually $2,000,000,000 worth of energy in the production of liquors. Under prohibition this expenditure would be transferred to channels truly productive, the Government could still get its $250,000,000, and the people would have $2,000,000,000 more in their pockets in addition food, munitions, clothing, etc.

"Besides this, there would be an increase in productive energy of from 10 per cent to 20 per cent. In Russia textile mills increased their productivity 9 per cent under prohibition; the Russian mines increased their productivity 30 per cent, and the Finnish mines 50 per cent. A Connecticut manufacturer, after careful reckoning, found that elimination of drunkenness would increase his factory's output 20 per cent.

"The total income of the people of the United States is about $45,000,000,000, of which three-fourths consists of wages and profits. By prohibition we would at least gain $2,200,000,000 through the release of human energy, in addition to the $2,000,000,000 saved by diverting drink expenditure to useful production, to say nothing of the saving in the cost of jails, almshouses, asylums, and the reduction of the death rate.

"Prohibition would not destroy revenue. My colleague, Prof. Adams, has suggested a definite scheme for new tax levies. Other schemes are easy to construct. The net result will not be additional economic or tax burdens, but quite the contrary. One might as well argue against a public-health measure to reduce the death rate on the ground that it would reduce the receipts from inheritance taxes. To keep alcohol for revenue is as absurd as to burn a house in order to roast a pig. Even without laying new taxes the old ones would yield more revenue automatically. For instance, the income tax would yield 10 per cent more. Most other tax receipts would increase correspondingly. We could even, for the present, let the tax bill alone and take a quarter or half billion of the oversubscription to the liberty loan.

"We simply can not afford the drink revenue in war time. It costs too much."

Mr. President, the arguments advanced by Prof. Fisher are unanswerable—that is, if words and figures are capable of making an unanswerable argument.

Without reading, Mr. President, on account of the limited time which I have, I am going to ask permission to insert in the RECORD an article from the pen of Prof. A. Caswell Ellis, of the University of Texas. I desire to print this article in the RECORD as the better expression of my own views. It covers every phase of the subject under consideration, and drives to despair the man who would undertake to answer the arguments and facts therein set forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES COST THE NATION MORE THAN THE SPECIAL WAR TAX—USE THE LABOR OF A MILLION MEN AND SEVEN BILLION POUNDS OF FOODSTUFF ANNUALLY.

To start out in a fight for life with a keg of beer strapped on your back is madness, no matter how much you enjoy a glass on occasion.

FAILURE TO STOP GREAT WASTE NOW IS TREASON.

The United States is face to face with a crisis in her own history and in the history of the human race. Whether government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall perish from the earth rests largely in our hands. Opposed to us is the greatest military and industrial machine the world has ever seen. For three years it has withstood the attacks of 20,000,000 brave men armed with all the weapons of science, adding each year new areas to its conquests, and to-day having in the field more men and equipment than ever before.

Seven million able-bodied men have already been killed and over 50,000,000 more are either in the trenches and training camps or are busy making munitions and army supplies. It is imperative that those left for the factories and field be brought to the highest possible efficiency and that every useless expenditure of material and men be stopped at once. Failure to strip our Nation of its greatest needless handicap to efficiency as we enter this war would be a colossal mistake; to dodge the issue from cowardice or from selfish considerations is treason.

THE LIQUOR BUSINESS THE LARGEST SINGLE WASTE.

The Nation's largest single waste is undoubtedly in the liquor traffic. The loss from the use of alcoholic beverages falls mainly under five heads: (1) The amount of foodstuff used in their manufacture and the human energy, the houses, and transportation facilities employed in the business; (2) the sickness and death resulting from the use of alcoholic beverages; (3) the lowered efficiency in work resulting from drinking by millions; (4) the crime due to drink; (5) the waste of public funds due to debauchery in public office because of the liquor fight.

THE FOOD WASTE.

The internal-revenue reports for 1916 show that 3,603,911,916 pounds of grain and molasses went that year into distilled spirits, and the census of 1900 (Vol. V, p. 602) shows that 2,260,266,146 pounds of corn, malt, and barley went that year into fermented liquors. The 50 per cent increase from 1900 to 1916 in the amount brewed would make 3,390,399,219 pounds as the amount used for fermented liquors in 1916.

A group of the most distinguished and reliable physiologists and economists in Harvard and Yale have shown that, after taking out one-sixth of this 6,994,311,135 pounds of foodstuff to produce denatured alcohol, there is left enough wasted food material each year to supply the energy requirements of 7,000,000 men for a year.

Why should we waste this enormous food suppiy and then ask the women to peel the potatoes a little thinner and force millions of poor women and children to go on half rations?

Is such saving of drops at the spigot while wasting a stream at the bunghole a reasonable act?

THE MEN AND MATERIAL WASTED.

But the waste of foodstuff is only the beginning. The Other Side (Apr. 2, 1917), published by the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association, gives 1,600,000 as the number of wage earners employed in the liquor business in the United States. The recent advertisement by the brewers states that hundreds of thousands of men are employed by them alone. I can not vouch for the reliability of these figures, but if even half that many, or 800,000 men, are working in the alcoholic-beverage business, they are badly needed now in the new places created by the war and those that will be left vacant by the 2,000,000 men who are going to the trenches. We are short of clerks, accountants, carpenters, brick masons, building material, freight cars, teams and wagons, autos, industrial alcohol, and glass jars. Our Nation needs now for more useful service to humanity not merely the 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuff worse than wasted but the hundreds of thousands of men, distilleries, breweries, warehouses, stores, freight cars, autos, teams, wagons, and tons of glass now used up in the manufacture, distribution, and sale of alcoholic drinks.

$1,750,000,000 PAID OVER THE BAR EACH YEAR.

No one knows exactly how much society pays directly for the support of all this army of men and billions of pounds of material and equipment employed in the liquor business. The lowest estimate made by a responsible party, and based on accurate revenue reports, of the amount paid by our Nation over the bars for alcoholic drinks is $1,750,000,000, or almost exactly the value of the average corn crop of the Nation, and nearly three times the value of an average cotton crop at 10 cents a pound. It is more than the amount of the special war taxes for the year. As it has been shown clearly by disinterested scientific men that even the little food value of the 2 ounces of alcohol that the body can use in a day is in nearly every case more than made up for by bodily wastes produced by the presence in the body of alcohol, this vast sum is just as completely wasted by the Nation as if we used all those hundreds of thousands of men and myriads of tons of food and equipment in shoveling sand on the beach to the right all the morning and then back to the left again all afternoon for the period of the war. Is that the act of intelligent beings?

COST OF SICKNESS AND DEATH RESULTING FROM ALCOHOL.

But what we are doing is worse than paying two billion a year for shoveling sand on the beach. We are allowing the sand to be shoveled into the organs of our bodies and the wheels of industry. Sixty-eight thousand men and women (valued at $1,700 each, or a total of $116,000,000 worth) die in the United States each year from diseases produced by alcohol. The records of 43 American insurance companies from 1885 to 1908, covering 2,000,000 policyholders, show a death rate in excess of the average for very moderate drinkers of 18 per cent, for those occasionally drinking to excess of 50 per cent, and for heavy drinkers of 86 per cent. A number of large separate companies here and abroad have recently published results of their experience that are more striking even than the above. (See Atlantic Monthly, November, 1916.)

Similarly, the reports of the South Australian sick benefit societies show that societies admitting both drinkers and nondrinkers have 92 per cent more cases of sickness per member than do societies admitting only abstainers, and that the members remain sick, on the average, 70 per cent longer. The records of the Leipsic sick benefit societies show that between 25 and 45 years of age habitual "drinkers" were sick 2⅞ times as often as the average insured person. American, English, and other records show similar facts. One-fourth of our insanity (costing $40,000,000 per year) and probably one-fifth of feeble-mindedness are due to alcohol. Also every commission that has investigated vice has reported alcohol as responsible for a large part of moral debauchery and probably over 50 per cent of venereal disease. Half of the houses of shame in Cincinnati actually had to close for want of support when the selling of alcoholic drinks was forbidden in all such places. Laboratory experiments have clearly shown that minute quantities of alcohol in the blood lower the powers of the blood serum and blood corpuscles to resist the germs of many diseases. These and numerous other similar facts make it very conservative to say that 10 per cent of the preventable diseases of the Nation are due to the use of alcoholic beverages. As our annual loss from preventable disease is admitted to be $1,500,000,000, this means that at least $150,000,000 is wasted by us each year through diseases caused by alcohol.

$600,000,000 WASTED THROUGH LOWERED WORKING CAPACITY.

No one knows exactly how much the productive capacity of the Nation is lowered by reductions of working power in moderate drinkers when not sick. Tests made by unbiased scientists in Germany and Switzerland showed that even as little as two to four mugs of beer a day cut down the work done by moderate drinkers 8 per cent in setting type, reduced the number of hits made in army rifle practice seven-eighths, and increased the time required for heavy mountain marches 22 per cent. Memory power and higher mental activities were reduced 40 per cent or more, although in this and in the sample activities the subjects thought they were doing better when under the influence of the alcohol. Numerous studies made in school and factory work have shown that alcohol usually reduces working power considerably and increases accidents and the destruction of material. While there may be some exceptions to the rule, it is certainly a safe estimate to assume that moderate drinkers are, on the average, 10 per cent less efficient because of alcohol. If one person in five is a moderate drinker, then 2 per cent of our national efficiency is destroyed by alcoholic beverages. The products of human efficiency on farms, and in mines, factories, etc., in the United States are worth about thirty billion per year. Two per cent of this, or $600,000,000, is therefore the price we pay in lowered efficiency for using alcoholic beverages very temperately.

$300,000,000 WASTED IN CRIME.

Conservative estimates by well-informed men place the cost of crime in the United States at $600,000,000 per year. The lowest estimate made of the part of this crime due to alcohol is 30 per cent and the highest is 70 per cent. Probably about 50 per cent, or $300,000,000 worth, is the amount of crime due directly or indirectly to our toleration of alcoholic drinks.

UNKNOWN MILLIONS WASTED THROUGH DEBAUCHERY OF PUBLIC OFFICE.

While we have many worthy officials, both pros and antis, who are well prepared for the duties of their offices, it is painfully obvious that hundreds of millions of money and invaluable opportunities for development of our resources are wasted by officials elected not for their fitness for the office but because either of their friendliness for or hostility to the liquor interests. This will continue as long as any considerable body of voters is left who attack the saloons, and it looks as if such a body will continue at least for the period of this war.

TOTAL PRICE PAID FOR HAVING ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES.

For the privilege of using alcoholic beverages indiscriminately, then, we are paying each year this price:

The labor of about a million men; 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs; houses, land, transportation, etc., all to the value of	$1,750,000,000
68,000 men and women killed by alcohol	116,000,000
Sickness produced by alcohol	150,000,000
Lowered efficiency in work due to alcohol	600,000,000
Crime due to alcohol	300,000,000
Debauchery in public office
Total yearly cost of alcoholic beverages	2,916,000,000

This is nearly double the amount of the special taxes asked for the support of the war for the first year. Can any rational man justify the waste during this emergency of three billion a year, including the use of 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs and the labor of a million men, merely in order that drunkards may have better opportunities to get drunk and moderate drinkers may lower their working efficiency with greater convenience?

WHAT CAN BE DONE?

Plainly the manufacture, distribution, and sale of alcoholic beverages ought to be stopped at once. The property employed in the business and the stock of liquors on hand should be taken over by the Government immediately and paid for at a price that is fair to the owners as well as the public. Every reasonable help should also be extended to those now employed in the business in finding promptly another employment. Such a plan would really benefit all concerned, as it would give the liquor men the only chance they are likely ever to have to dispose of their property before it is confiscated. On the other hand, the Government can now, with comparative ease, find a use for most of the distilleries, breweries, and other equipment in making munitions, industrial alcohol, and other supplies urgently needed. The supply of liquors on hand could be converted into munitions or sold for medical purposes as seemed best. In this way neither the liquor men nor the public will suffer seriously, while the Nation will step up on a plane of vastly higher efficiency in this war and in the peace that will follow.

A. CASWELL ELLIS,
The University of Texas.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, this is about all that I have to say. If the facts and figures here submitted are true—and no man will question their accuracy—there is no escape from the conclusion. Nor can there be any excuse for the Senate's failure to put a stop to this evil and, save the Nation from further humiliation at the hands of the liquor demon. The only excuse or justification that can be offered for the continuance of the liquor traffic in this country at this time, or at any other time, is that a few men may make money out of the business. The pernicious effect, mentally and morally, physically and financially, of the liquor traffic upon the human being is too well known to make it necessary for me to go into details or to expatiate at length upon it. Suffice it to say that its effect universally is to defeat the promises and frustrate the ambitions of youth, to blight the hopes of mature manhood, to shadow the evening of old age with disappointment, and adumbrate the last hours with sorrow, regret, and shame. It has contributed more inmates to the lunatic asylums, filled the jails with criminals, the poorhouses with paupers—in a word, caused more unhappiness, broken more hearts—than all other agencies for evil combined. The idea of sacrificing human bodies, damning human souls, and putting a burden upon children yet unborn in order that a few financially bloated, avaricious, sordid individuals might add to their incomes is, to my mind, ineffably monstrous.

The devoted husband is torn from the bosom of his loving wife; the loyal and dutiful son is taken from the arms of his loving mother, a sacrifice to the god of war. He gives his life, his honor, his very soul, that the flag may float triumphantly in the air. Everybody is called upon to make a sacrifice, and the sacrifice is willingly made, except the man who has a thirst for beer or the brewer and distiller who have an insatiable greed for gold.

To borrow a figure of speech from classical history, the liquor traffic in America is verily the economic "Infamy of Crete." It is an evil without a mitigating incident—the blight that sears the heart and gives nothing in return except the leer of the damned. It has no proper place in a civilized country and is an affront to the Christianity of the age. No man can read the Sermon on the Mount or the Decalogue, and believe them, and then vote against this measure which brings Nation-wide prohibition, without an accusing sense of treachery.

Just think of the absurdity of the proposition that it is perfectly proper in war times to limit the amount of bread and meat that a laboring man may eat, or the quantity of milk that feeds the starving babe, while at the same time the Congress is legalizing the liquor traffic, or perhaps I would state the situation more correctly if I should say refusing to prohibit the liquor traffic; using the foodstuffs needed to sustain and nourish the body and converting them into a beverage that kills the body and damns the soul. That this nefarious traffic should be permitted to continue its moral degradations and physical ravages, with congressional and presidential approval, is in such sharp contrast with the spirit of enlightened Christianity that I stand appalled in the presence of the egregious blunder.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on January 9, 1915, the attorney general of the State of Texas, Hon. B. F. Looney, brought suit in the district court of Hopkins County, Tex., at Sulphur Springs, against certain breweries in Texas, to wit: the San Antonio Brewing Association, San Antonio, Tex.; the Lone Star Brewing Co., San Antonio, Tex.; the Houston Ice & Brewing Co., Houston, Tex.; the American Brewing Association, Houston, Tex.; the Galveston Brewing Co., Galveston, Tex.; the Dallas Brewery, Dallas, Tex.; and the Texas Brewing Co., Fort Worth, Tex.

The suit was brought on account of alleged violations by the defendants of the antitrust laws of the State and the use of their corporate means and assets in politics and elections, in violation of both the laws and the constitution of the State of Texas.

When the case came on for trial the defendants, in effect, pleaded guilty and accepted a fine aggregating $281,000, together with the expenses incurred by the attorney general and the court costs, amounting to about $8,000 more. I have here a summary of the testimony which was developed in the case. It is a most interesting exposition of the activities of the brewing interests in politics. I ask that it be set out in the RECORD. I believe it will be of great value in the campaign against the liquor traffic.

THE BREWERIES AND TEXAS POLITICS.

The cases came to trial at Sulphur Springs January 24, 1916. The defendants in effect pleaded guilty to the charges brought and accepted a fine aggregating $281,000 plus court expenses of $8,000, charters forfeited. The procedure and evidence were published in two volumes entitled "The Breweries in Texas Politics," and the page references below are to pages in said volumes:

TEXAS BREWERS' ASSOCIATION.

DEAR SIRS: We have a State-wide prohibition fight on our hands and it is fast and furious. It has only one merit, and that is short duration. * * * We need money and are appealing to all merchants, manufacturers, persons, and corporations from whom each of the breweries in Texas bought goods in the year 1907 to give 1 per cent of the amount of the bill bought and paid for.

On this basis we assess you the sum of $——. Kindly send us your check at once, making it payable to the writer individually. This donation from you will be bread cast upon the waters.

Yours, very truly,

TEXAS BREWERY ASSOCIATION.

The letter in acknowledgment of payment says that this cooperation "shows us the large number of friends and adherents we have in Texas and all other States and have given us renewed vigor to press on the fight and let loose the dogs of war."

Page 24. When a firm in Prague, Bohemia, did not pay up this assessment, they wrote: "We would very much appreciate the courtesy of a reply informing us why you have so tacitly refused to contribute toward the funds of our campaign. Yours, truly, Texas Brewers' Association."

Page 31. The petitioners asserted "that such demands were reenforced by threats and understandings of future boycotts against such persons, firms, and corporations."

Charge the brewers with the payment of poll taxes or the advancement of money for many thousands of persons in Texas. * * * Carrying on active campaign to induce persons to secure poll-tax receipts. * * * Paid agents sent out thousands of cards, circulars, and pamphlets issued; payment of campaign expenses; keeping of permanent political headquarters; the use of money in various ways to prevent calling of local-option elections; the use of money contesting the results of such elections, the buying of votes, and influence; the use of money to influence or control city, State, and national elections.

Page 34. Correspondence of brewers subscribing plans to secure a court judgment that the poll-tax law is unconstitutional. A law firm is to receive $2,500 if they can effect such a decision. Brewers to pay two-thirds and liquor dealers the other third.

Page 37. Brewers report for the month of April, 1908, speaks of copying the names of voters in over 80 counties. Keeping a list of 50,000 names of friends scattered all over the State.

Page 41. From general report of office for January, 1909 (Paget): "The office sent out over a quarter of a million handbills. If we had had 10 days more or 4 more men in the field, there would have been 700,000 poll taxes paid."

Page 44. Report "the bitterest fight, which is not yet concluded, was in Hardin County. We met the sawmill interest, who spent much money."

Page 48. From report: "Every colored paper in Texas is carrying our advertisement and is working in the interest of poll-tax payment, and from now on meetings will be held in all communities where the colored people are numerous urging the payment of poll taxes."

Page 52. A letter from Wahrmund to Adoue objects to a phrase in Paget's report, viz: "'Will say in passing that I do not believe the poll-tax matter will cost us one-half this year.' As previously stated, to put such things in black and white is a very dangerous proceeding."

Page 54. O. Koehler says: "I was simply thunderstruck when I learned of the large remittances made to Mr. Wahrmund." W. explained that this represented "items to take care of on account of meeting friends to make the race for the Senate and the House."

Page 56. Adoue (brewer) speaks of Dr. Helt: "Immediately after reading his article I went after the doctor and succeeded in locating him in Evansville, Ind., where they have started the National Reform League, and I expect to have the doctor in Texas at an early date. The head of the league was here last week to arrange preliminaries. * * * Adoue introduces H. to a Prohibitionist who is to bring him out in Texas. * * * I believe the doctor coming to Texas under the auspices of some prominent Prohibitionist will have a vast influence on the next July primaries. His expenses will be paid by the National Reform League. He will have no connection with the brewers or liquor dealers. Who supports the league is another question. Yours, B. Adoue."

Page 57. Letter from O. Koehler to Adoue on the need of sending speakers into northern Texas to influence the primaries to stop agitation for submission of prohibition amendment. "Of course it will cost a great deal of money. * * * We assured them of our support to the extent of $10,000."

Page 64. Otto Koehler writes Adoue that "those interested in the sale of beer have stopped at nothing to induce such payments" (of poll taxes).

"Our efforts have not been confined to any one section of the State, but have extended from the Panhandle to the Gulf and from El Paso to Orange."

Page 66. Koehler makes mention of a McDermott-Gardner fund contributed by all the large breweries of the United States to the 1911 campaign. This was $5,000 a month.

Page 68. J. B. Rayner. "I came here last Friday evening and went immediately to the house of the pastor of the Colored Baptist Church and found out he was carrying on a protracted meeting and was drawing all the colored voters to his meeting. Friday night we had a secret caucus with the best of the leaders. I told them how to mark their tickets and who could vote and set in motion some subtle forces which would get the colored voters to the polls." To Wahrmund: "I have placed the iron hand of Machiavellian diplomacy upon the religious, educational, and business gatherings of my people. I have wet a score of dry counties in Texas or kept them from drying. * * * I am now doing all I can to make the colored pastors of your city your political friends."

Page 70. Letter to Wahrmund: "I now believe that we will get 90 per cent of the negro vote. It required more money than it would have taken had it not been for the Luedde play with the negro saloonkeeper. The indications are that we will be able to handle it on about $4,000."

Page 74. Adoue writes: "Messrs. * * * and Hawes request that when the brewers write to them they would use plain envelopes and plain paper."

Page 78. "Prior to 1910, one J. L. Griffin, a negro preacher, known as Sin-killer Griffin, and other negroes formed an organization under the name of 'Rescue Association of the United States of America and Africa,' and incorporated the same under the laws of the State, the charter granted authorizing it to engage in the work of rescuing fallen women. Such charter was secured in fraud upon the State and the public, and the purpose of such organization has never been such as named, but to do political work principally among negroes for the Texas Brewers' Association." The association has financed it.

Page 79. The Rev. J. L. Griffin is supreme president of the Rescue Association of the United States and Africa.

Page 80. Luedde: Busch's agent organizes the Citizens' Forward Movement to stimulate payment of poll taxes.

Page 89. The United States Brewers' Association membership dues is 1 cent a barrel. This gives an annual fund of $600,000; but there are constantly extra assessments of the same amount. February, 1912, in Chicago, the brewers agreed to pay extra assessment of 2 cents for five years, 1913–1918. This makes the annual income of the association for those years from dues and this extra assessment $1,200,000. In five years this would be seven millions.

Page 92. Letter from Adolphus Busch, October 19, 1905: Describes an educational bureau created by me and some of my friends for the benefit of the brewing business of the United States.

"Most of our people have no idea of the true merits of beer; they know nothing of its wholesomeness and its superior nutritious properties and rather believe all the false things said about this article. No voice has ever been raised to correct this wrong impression people have got about beer. It is my aim to win the American people over to our side to make them all lovers of beer and teach them to have respect for the brewing industry and the brewer. This work has got to be done systematically, and the best writers of the country will have to lend their assistance. It may cost us a million of dollars, and even more, but what of it if thereby we elevate our position? I stand ready to sacrifice my annual profits for years to come if I can gain my point and make people look upon beer in the right light.

"We must pay over to the United States Brewers' Association whatever it may require to represent us properly before Congress, where we have most important bills to defend. We must defeat that Hepburn-Dolliver bill, which is most dangerous and antagonistic to our industry and which makes prohibition possible. Then we want to defeat any bill which may be brought up to increase the revenue tax on beer, with which we are now threatened. We want to reestablish the military canteen at all Army posts and on our men of war. * * * All this will cost lots of money; we do not want to spend one cent bribing the good people, but we will have to be liberal with the press of many States and with friends to gain the ear of Senators or Members of Congress and enlist their good will." October 19, 1905.

"The defeat of the 79 bills of Congress during the past session is in great measure due to our efforts."

MY DEAR COLONEL: In the campaign just closed in the State of Maine in which our people were so much interested your assistance and advice was of great help and benefit and is thoroughly appreciated by us * * *.

JOHN A. MCDERMOTT.

Page 99. A letter from Fox, March 19, 1913, marked "Confidential," in which he treats of contracts of the brewers with the unions of their employees; evidently is working to get as low a scale of wages as possible:

"If the local agent of an outside brewer takes the initiative by making an independent contract, he can easily jeopardize the whole negotiations between the local brewers and the unions and thus enable the latter to execute a flank movement."

Page 102. The National Association of Commerce and Labor issues discount stamps to put on bills assessed the customary 1 per cent. They describe this money as "their voluntary contribution toward the antiprohibition fund."

Page 103. One per cent collections.

"These remarks would also apply to the Whitlock Pipe Co. in case where they refuse to accept stamps we will see them as soon as it is possible to do so * * *.

"NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
"E. T. BUSH."

Page 104. The national association asserts that there are over 50,000 firms supplying the brewing trade (i. e., in the United States). "Only in one or two isolated instances was there any objections raised to the deduction. The inference is permissible that the discount plan has been very generally accepted."

Page 109. The Sons of Hermann protesting against the Hobson bill.

Page 117. The Texas Brewers Association alone, from 1902 to June, 1907, raised on a 20-cent levy per barrel approximately $900,000. For 1908–9, $400,000 in two years. For 1910, at 30 cents per barrel, $300,000; 1911, $370,000.

These sums represent only what the State is able to prove, the indications and the presumptions to be drawn from the evidence being that the sums proved constitute but a part—probably a small part—of the grand total spent. Besides this are large sums spent by the wholesale liquor dealers, the retailers, and saloon keepers.

Page 124. Letter of Texas Brewers' Association (B. Adoue, president) to the Kansas City Machine Works:

"DEAR SIRS: We have a State-wide prohibition fight on our hands, and it is fast and furious. * * * We need money and are appealing to all merchants, manufacturers, persons, and corporations from whom each of the breweries in Texas bought goods in the year 1907 to give us 1 per cent of the amount of the bill bought and paid for. On this basis we assess you the sum of $500. Kindly send us your check at once, making it payable to the writer individually. This donation from you will be bread cast upon the waters."

Page 126. Lists are kept of those not responding to the call.

Page 145, April, 1910, election in Grayson County, $5,000 spent by the brewers' agent Autrey.

Page 150. O. Koehler, of the San Antonio Brewing Co., to Aug. Busch. In 1911 Texas brewers raised $360,000 on barrelage; Busch sent $100,000; Lemp Pabst and Schlitz sent $45,000. In all, $505,000 from these sources.

Adolphus Busch writes from Ivy Wall, Pasadena:

"Everybody must do his full duty and be forced to do it. I will not mind to give $100,000 extra, if necessary * * *. Mr. Cettis is of the opinion that it needs a great deal of money in order to gain a great victory. * * * Missouri recently went through a most strenuous campaign, winning out by an enormous majority. Well, you can barely imagine the cost of that campaign. * * * Now, my dear Adoue, if we sacrifice one-half of our entire earnings in 1911 in order to make up this campaign fund, it is not so very serious. * * * All your home banks should write letters to their correspondents in Texas to use all their influence against State-wide prohibition. All your wholesale grocers in the various cities should write to all customers in the country, imploring them to down State-wide prohibition. That is what we did in Missouri."

Page 154. The vice president of my bank is one of the best friends among the bankers we have, but his associates are strong prohibitionists. He assures me that he has used the desirable balance which I have carried with him for many years successfully as an argument against the Philistines, and that thus we have succeeded, so to speak, in splitting the bank on the question. (Weeden, of the Texas Brewing Co., to Althans, of Anheuser-Busch.)

Page 158. Five hundred dollars from the York Manufacturing Co., York, Pa., for the 1911 campaign fund; $500 from the Southwestern Engineering & Supply Co.

Page 164. Koehler writes to Adoue that he expects to secure six figures from the Cincinnati interest. Koehler writes: "We must get the business element interested in our cause and show them that the breweries and saloon men are the least interested in the great question of personal liberty."

Page 214. The Texas poll-tax law was adopted in 1902 against strenuous brewer opposition. In 1902 Riggs, manager of the Texas Brewing Association, writes Wahrmund:

"I would suggest that it would be well for us to arrange for the San Antonio Express and other papers that you were to handle to oppose the poll-tax amendment upon the position that it does not give the laboring man or the poor man right to vote. You know how to handle them and get this before the public. * * * It is very important that we advise the laboring element—the poor people—of our State, without thereby making ourselves conspicuous, that this is a kind of class movement, done for the purpose of destroying the rights of the poor man, centralizing governmental power in the hands of a few."

Page 229. Paget writes, December, 1904:

"I have every labor journal in the State, as well as one or two daily papers, carrying in each issue advertisement and other article as written or inspired by this office."

Page 232. Describes campaign for urging payment of poll taxes. Paget writes, February 1, 1905:

"There was sent to every town, village, or hamlet in the State large cards urging payment of poll taxes. Men were employed in the various counties to put them up in conspicuous places. About 12 newspapers were contracted with to carry standing advertisements and editorials bearing on poll taxes. * * * The writer, through labor organizations, is working to that end (repeal of poll tax), but the members of the house or senate seem to fear tackling it."

Page 232. American Brewing Association writes August 2, 1905:

"Mr. L. M. McDaniel called on me several days ago and said that if we would guarantee $50 for expenses he would bring the negro convention to Houston. The principal advantage to be attained by the convention being held here is that it would give the anti speakers an opportunity to impress on the negroes the necessity of paying the poll tax."

Page 234. Paget, November 9, 1905:

"I can perfect arrangements to have the labor organizations of the State take up the fight for us. They did last year in this poll-tax matter."

Page. 235. S. A. Brewing Co., November 12, 1905:

"Under the law we can not pay the poll tax of others without laying ourselves criminally liable, but you may say to Mr. Martin and other friends that the Brewers' Association of the State of Texas is not liable."

Page 236. Paget, December 13, 1905:

"I believe that if the election is called between now and the 1st of February the prohibitionists will win, as very few Mexicans pay their poll taxes."

Page 245. Paget, January 17, 1906:

"I am going, Mr. Hausman, to speak very frankly. I believe these men should have assistance in paying their poll taxes if you want the county to go wet. Ten dollars spent in this way would save one hundred in making a contest."

Page 247. Luedde, Busch's correspondent at Waco:

"I have paid out $500 to the parties at Temple * * * and provided they need more for the poll-tax campaign I will pay it to them. Postscript: Tear this up." (He asks remittance of exchange, i. e., not a check.)

Page 255. Paget, February 4, 1907:

"In several counties we have had men at work urging the payment of poll taxes * * *. We have also had our friends before a couple of religious conventions and gradually the colored man is coming to have a proper understanding of his position relative to local option."

Page 255. Luedde writes, February 7, 1907:

"We feel if this poll-tax law could be knocked out for the small sum of $2,500 that it would be the best investment that we have made in a long while."

Page 257. Luedde writes:

"With the poll tax knocked out we would have no trouble in winning a great many counties that we now can not touch at all, because as a general thing our kind of people are very poor hands to pay their poll taxes, whereas the prohibitionists always pay theirs."

Page 258. San Antonio Brewing Association to Adoue:

"I wrote you several times in regard to letter writing, and again only recently directed your attention to the great danger of certain correspondence on part of Mr. Paget; but I note that he again comes out in an open letter to Mr. Autrey, in which he asks if it is not time that something was being done in matter of payment of poll taxes. I deem that is very dangerous proceeding, and it should by all means be stopped immediately."

Page 258. Kitchner, of San Antonio Brewery, writes, January 9, 1908:

"We are trying to get Judge Dean to run as senator, and I believe he will go if paid for his time while away from his business. I feel quite sure it will take at least $3,000 to pay him while away from his practice here, but he would be a valuable man in the legislature at this time. I think we can get Judge Burns, who is also a good one, without paying him anything. Burns has been speaker of the house in New Mexico and knows how to do things."

Page 261. Weeden, of the Texas Brewing Co., writes, February 1, 1908, of poll taxes in Fort Worth:

"W. matched dollar for dollar with another representative of the liquor interests. On this basis we paid out $1,500 and succeeded in getting a little over 1,000 first-class, picked men sorted out by Mr. Bud Brown from his experience in preceding years."

Page 263. Rayner writes, November 14, 1908:

"I am doing my best to make the indifferent, the purposeless, and homeless negro pay his poll tax inside the time limit while he has money. I have 4,000 cards like the inclosed, and I will place one prominently in every negro barber shop, eating house, saloon, and every other negro business in Texas, and will supplement this advertisement with help of every negro official in secret-society lodges, every negro preacher, and the negro newspapers in Texas. I am satisfied I will induce at least 50,000 negroes in Texas to pay their poll taxes in time."

Paget writes Autrey, of the Houston Brewing Co.:

"Now is the time for working among the negroes; after Christmas they will not have a dollar."

Page 265. Liquor interests asked advice of lawyers as to methods of getting around the poll-tax law:

"Can a corporation be formed under the laws of Texas for the purpose of accumulation and loan of money to its members for the purpose of paying their poll taxes?"

Page 272, Paget, '09, proposes to publish in the papers a list of shysters who refuse to pay poll taxes and to threaten to do so elsewhere.

Page 274. Otto Koehler, of the San Antonio Brewery Association:

"The brewery, being corporation, can not subscribe to the funds in question as it would be against the law and would constitute a criminal offense, but the writer and our Mr. Wahrmund as individuals can do so, and we hand you herewith our check."

Page 274, Morgan, of the Dallas Brewery, writes to Paget, '09:

"As to this county will state that through the chamber of commerce we have a good organization, consisting of the able support of both the Dallas Morning News and Times-Herald, which papers in every issue are urging the people to pay their poll taxes."

Page 277. Brewers' Report, January, 1909, speaks of the host of colored preachers who in the highways and byways of the State roused up the Negro * * *.

Page 278. Paget says: "If we had had 10 days more or four more men in the field there would have been 700,000 poll taxes paid." This is in the brewers' report.

Page 286: Paget: "Every meeting of colored educational bodies has been attended by our friends, who have kept down with considerable trouble all resolutions opposed to your interests * * *. Every colored paper in Texas is carrying our advertisement and is working in the interest of poll-tax payment."

Page 287. Letter to Paget from Littlefield:

"The Mexican voter should be urged to take out his poll tax, for he can go to the polls in primaries, while the Negro can't participate in primaries."

Page 288. Paget writes:

"Inclosed find copy of a Lincoln circular, of which 100,000 have been distributed in Texas. Forty-five Negro churches read it from the pulpit yesterday in Dallas and four in Beaumont."

Page 295. Paget, campaign manager, writes, December 7, 1910:

"Here is a letter signed by the president of the Federation of Labor, and over his own signature a request that the address be placed in the hands of every labor man. He is also in the field in an endeavor to awaken an interest in the payment of poll taxes."

Page 296. Paget speaking of equipment of his agents says:

"They carry a power of attorney by which any man can appoint another his agent to pay his poll tax."

Page 300. Sayers, beer dealer at Hondo, writes:

"Now, in regard to State-wide election in 1911, there are some 350 Mexicans in this county and I believe by giving a dinner here and having speeches made I can secure 200 voters to pay their poll tax."

"We have also received the respective notice from our railroads here and have immediately put ourselves in communication with the different members of our association and notified all our customers along the line to immediately enter a protest against such a bill to their representatives at Austin."

"We have all the good help on the part of the railroads."

Page 328. "We will also endeavor to raise a fund to the extent of $1,000 or more for the purpose of defraying the expense of securing a change by the present legislature of the Sunday law to the closing hours between 9 a. m. and 4 p. m."

Page 328. "It is just one of those bills where we have to muster all our forces very quietly and call her up on a certain day and pass it without even letting it come to debate and therefore it is preferable not to make any amendments."

Page 331. "The enormous expense that we have been put to in fighting adverse legislation."

"We defeated the beer-inspection bill, also the bill to make violation of the local-option law a felony."

Page 331. Busch advises, in case certain legislation failed, "to open all the water mains leading into your beautiful Capitol and drown the rascals out like a lot of rats. The only available solution of the question in our favor seems to lie in the prevention of the election to the Texas Legislature of such men that incline to prohibition and in the forcible election of liberal members. It should be the watchword throughout the entire State."

"You can handle the press as you see fit. It might not be best to use the columns of the papers with our paid matter, but to so handle that department of the work from Austin that all matters will simply go in as news items * * *. The correspondents of the papers with whom we have contracts would no doubt, if properly handled, give us all the space we want." * * *

Page 386. C. W. Woodman, editor of the Union Banner, writes to the Texas Brewing Co. proposing to enact laws to better protect the liquor interests and to repeal laws inimical to organized labor and the liquor interests. * * * To make contracts for the publication of labor news on these lines; to furnish all weekly papers with a column or more of such labor news as pertain to the local option question. * * * All bills will be framed up in such a manner as to make them labor bills.

Page 409. Autrey writes to the San Antonio Brewing Association, 1906, in behalf of Mr. C. K. Walters, "a fair-minded man but his financial strength is weak. Perhaps you would like to render him some assistance; if so, just mail check for whatever you donate to me and I will see that it is turned over to him."

Page 413. The breweries kept a record of all the candidates for the legislature and numbered and classed them as one might classify sheep and cattle.

Lists given on pages 413–416.

Page 418. Adoue writes: "When the Fort Worth Record started I subscribed $7,500 stock, which I divided among my friends as an investment."

Page 428. R. F. Cook to Cetti, of the Texas Brewing Co., writes: "Just before the ballot was taken on the original Love amendment, the San Antonio man and I, fearing that the vote would be close, induced two of the members who were hopelessly against us to engage in a domino game where we succeeded in holding them until it was too late for them to do us any harm."

Page 435. Adoue writes of proposed contesting of a law: "It is bad policy for breweries to fight any law; their reputation is bad enough without it. Avoid ostentatious litigation."

Page 440. A telegram from Adolph Busch from Pasadena to Texas Brewers' Convention: "I most earnestly hope that all will make the strongest effort to weed out the strong objectionable saloons and not to permit them to exist. By doing this we * * * prevent greater trouble and danger for the beer industry." S. T. Morgan, of the Dallas Brewery, comments: "So you see that the main offenders in the past have realized that to save the brewing business they must change their ways * * *"

Page 441. Weeden, of Texas Brewing Co., writes: "It was unanimously agreed that a determined effort * * * must be made to influence the selection of the next legislature. This, of course, will cost a good deal of money, and it is plainly evident that the donation of 5 cents per barrel would not be sufficient."

Page 447. Arthur Koenig writes from Pasadena, Cal., February 15, 1908: "Mr. Busch wishes me to thank you for your kind communication, etc. * * * The Catholic clergy should be approached and requested to express its opinion on the present prohibition movement same as was done by Archbishop Gibbons, Baltimore, and Archbishop Glenny, St. Louis. If there is a bishop anywhere in Texas he should be carefully interviewed through channels friendly to our cause, and the substance of such interview made public afterwards. * * * Also the rabbis of the Jewish congregation who always are friendly to us and our industry. * * * I am working with my dear chief day and night on the question, 'To be or not to be.'"

Page 455. Adoue mentions Judge Bellew as writing "If I were able financially to make the race and give time to serve in the legislature I would make the race, but I can not afford it."

Page 468. Morgan, of the Dallas Brewery, writing to San Antonio Brewery, proposes an investigation of prohibition States by members of the legislature who are broad-gauged and liberal.

"The funds necessary to make the investigation should come from the business interests and property owners, and no one directly or indirectly interested in the liquor business should contribute one cent toward such expenses, in order that the men making the investigation could get up on the floor of either House and say that they made the investigation at the request and expense of the business men and property owners of this State."

Page 471. Morgan writes to the S. E. Brewery: "I turned the article inclosed * * * over to Mr. Wortham, and we will both make every effort to have the same published in to-morrow evening's News, but we are very much in doubt if we will be able to get the News to copy the article without having same appear as paid matter; and if this is done, we don't think it would be worth the price, as everyone would know that the brewers had the article reproduced, and, of course, it would not have the desired effect."

Page 483. The Texas State Federation of Labor induced to pass a resolution against legislation hostile to any labor men, i. e., brewery trades-unions.

Page 484. "Mr. Lilienthal admitted that the American Brewing Association paid the advertisement in the Texas Deutsche Zeitung regularly every month, and a good price at that, but that was only done because the publisher of that paper was a member of the legislature, just as the American Brewing Association pays for an advertisement in the Cuero Star because Mr. Crisp is a member of the legislature." Letter in which the editor of the South Texas Star speaks of soliciting advertising from the brewers.

Page 495. Mr. A. S. Crisp of the Cuero Star, writes to Morgan asking the renewal of the advertisement contract of $100. "As a member of the liquor committee I accomplished the defeat of a bill designed to teach prohibition in the public schools of the State * * *."

Later Morgan writes that Crisp has appealed several times for advertising, and advises turning him down on the ground that we should not "do so much advertising, especially for people who are holding the same belief as ourselves."

A. S. Crisp writes to H. Prince:

"DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: Please accept my sincere thanks for your courtesy in honoring bill for last half of annual contract at this time. In a little over a month the solons will be again gathering at Austin, and if there is anything there you want attended to it will give me great pleasure to serve you at any time."

Page 512. For a half century it has been the law of Texas that a corporation shall not use its powers, means, or assets for any purpose except to accomplish the legitimate objects of its creation. These particular corporations were chartered to manufacture and sell beer and ice, and were not created for "education," "suffrage," or "elections." Again, since 1907 it has been a criminal offense for any officer or agent of corporations to use the corporations' money directly or indirectly to affect the result of any sort of an election.

Page 513. Hordes of field men, white and negro, employed to carry local-option contests and to get poll taxes paid.

Page 514. Morgan, secretary of the Brewers' Association, cautions utmost secrecy: "We believe that success depends largely upon every member being extremely guarded even in talking to the best of friends, and that our business is ours and does not concern anyone else. Unless this is done and strict secrecy maintained, we will have to make an open fight. * * * Special organizations of saloon men * * * are calculated to create prejudice. * * * We would therefore most earnestly request that you advise all of your customers to let their organization, if they have one at all, be secret."

Page 530. San Antonio Brewing Co. say that their expenses for these fights "almost equal, if they do not exceed, our profits."

Page 555. Adolphus Busch writes Cetti December 5, 1908: "The prohibition agitation has cost me more than a million dollars already, because Anheuser-Busch must always bear the burden of everything. We have been spending $30,000 every month in defense of the beer industry. We have done more than all the breweries together, and I am bound to make a part of this by looking for profits on outside investments, and especially in the real estate line."

Page 562. Busch writes from Pasadena to Cetti: "No money or labor should be spared to recapture Grayson County out of the clutches of the pros."

Koehler complains of Paget's asking for $3,000 for Caldwell County: "It certainly can not be a question of buying the negro votes, for as I understand it there are none to be bought in that county."

Page 567. Adoue writes that for antiprohibition election work "we are going to spend enough money sufficient to build a fine brewery."

In 1911 Busch read a communication to the citizens of Dallas threatening to stop work on the Adolphus Hotel if Dallas went dry. This was a million and a half hotel.

Page 575. Issie Friedlander is described as "one of the best men in the State of Texas to hunt up and haul niggers to the polls."

Page 578. Kaufman writes to Wahrmund: "The negroes, about 1,500 votes, are well taken care of. Mr. Maier foreseeing this election has paid out about $1,000 paying poll taxes for negroes, which are in his safe."

Page 581. Some officials of the International & Great Northern Railroad having taken part in Anderson County prohibition elections, the American Brewing Co. writes, "that each and every brewery should withhold all the patronage that they possibly can from that road. We request that you have no shipments made to us over the International & Great Northern Railroad."

Page 598. Paget writes as to Adoue that $3,000 is necessary for a county election. "With this amount of money and an extra subscription which we may be able to squeeze out of the saloon men we have a chance to win the fight; without it not any."

Page 606. San Antonio Brewing Co. writes to Blum of an attempt to contest a dry vote: "Our ex-Judge Felps is the one who undertakes declaring the past proelection void. He was county judge at the time and refuses to give information as to his form of work for fear other attorneys detect his plan. The amount required is $1,500 if he is successful. Otherwise it costs nothing, but he is sure that he can do this. Among whisky dealers and breweries the amount is $1,000 and local dealers agreed on $500, which is ready, and Judge Felps instructed to proceed with his work

Brewery Co. answers Blum: "* * * This is a matter about which it will be necessary to be very careful, and it will have to be handled in the strictest of confidence."

Page 650. Koehler writes 1910: "Will abide by your judgment. Handle in your name. We must not be known in transaction. Strictly confidential."

Page 650. Letter to Houston Brewery: "All our voters are Mexicans, but we need money to work it."

Page (?). Miller from San Antonio Brewing Association. After a defeat a contest. In order to facilitate this he proposes: "How would it do to see them and suggest to them in the event we won that a nice saloon would be started for the sale of beer only. We understand their principal objection to the sale of whisky is on account of the trouble it creates with certain of the boys who go there to trade. Beer would not set anyone wild, and if you and other good friends there and in the vicinity wanted a little whisky you can always get it just as you do now."

Page 660. American Brewing Association to Causey:

"If an election is ordered (in Colorado County), we advise that the saloon men use every effort to get the prominent men of the county to assist in making the fight, as our experience has shown that if the fight is made only by the saloon men it has not proved successful."

Page 691. Paget to Levy:

"When a county has become dry, it is nearly impossible to bring it back to the wet column without a large expense of money and energy, especially the former."

Page 698. Horlock to Houston Brewery:

"Plan to run a wagon to Somerville (evidently a dry place). Don't have any lettering on it at all. They promise to start at once on some southern select beer."

Page 724. San Antonio Brewing Association writes congratulating on a wet victory: "We are told that the immigration agents of the Southern Pacific Co. were awaiting the result before turning the tide of immigration to your section."

Page 732. Adoue offers to contribute to an election fund $1,000. I believe that this offer should be strictly private; not even the members of your committee should know it.

Page 737. M. B. Davis, jr., a beer litterateur writes:

"I have written an article, if used, which should be calculated to arouse the Jews, the Catholics, and the laboring element, including the farmer, against the Anti-Saloon League and Rockefeller. For the Jews I quote from the St. Louis rabbi and for the Catholics the St. Louis priest. I see Samuel Gompers, the great labor leader, has come out against prohibition."

Page 740 Davis writes:

"I went to the court dockets to see about statistics as to drunkenness, but, as they are against us in comparison, I quickly withdrew.

Page 742. Davis suggests the organization of the Texas Progressive League:

"Speakers could be sent out under the auspices of this league, and thus with one fell blow rob the pro orators of their stock saying that the breweries and distillers are fighting for their existence and are the ones that are carrying on the fight. * * * I also think we ought to throw out some interviews to the public through the leading State papers of the direful effects of prohibition seen by traveling men, covering a range of subjects, for instance, when men are denied beer they go to whisky; and if moderate users of whisky they are driven to the whole bottle and jug; that men are falling away from church."

Page 744. Davis speaks of the fatal stabbing of a popular deputy constable in the red-light district by a drunken Mexican as causing prohibition sentiment. But we are trying to keep the pro minds diverted by the cotton palace project.

Page 774. Paget: "Elections were held in three precincts in Jefferson County, and were carried because Mr. Gary and I * * * fixed matters so that the election would be declared in our favor. If we had not done so, the elections would have gone pro. * * * It was the cheapest election where so much was involved I was ever in. Mr. Gary asked me to notify you * * * that the goods were delivered, the three boxes were declared anti by a decent majority."

Page 823. Letter of Hall to Wahrmund: "Mr. D. Kelley, representing the Lone Star and American, has put up $200 (to carry an election). He is the man who has been supplying the bootleggers in that community, and before the law went into effect * * * I was sending from 3 to 10 casks daily into that territory."

Paget tells how Lampasas County went dry: "The shooting took place on Friday night. The man died Saturday. The election was held Monday and the funeral procession went past the voting place. Every church in the county was pressed into the crusade Sunday; nothing was preached but the blighting influence of the saloon. There was no time to reply."

Colored antis.

Page 839. Lindsay writes to S. A. Brewing Association: "After winning the election the boys wanted to give a dance to the Mexicans who stayed with us so loyally in the fight, and as the Lone Star had sent five kegs for the barbecue, thought you would willingly donate for the dance."

Page 883. Hedeman writes to Wahrmund affirming that he had bought 34 votes but was surprised to find out that some of the antis voted pro secretly.

Page 900. We have assisted our friends in taking out about 2,000 poll taxes and we now feel that we are safe, as far as McLennan County is concerned. In checking up to-day we find we are about $850 short.

Page 913. Paget describes the negroes as half child and wholly grafter. You must know how to handle them.

Page 917. Moore to Luedde: "Already many evidences exist showing that the colored brother has been pretty well greased. * * * I had hoped that we could make this fight on $3,000, but I confess that it looks to me as if that is not going to be enough."

Page 925. Rayner says he is "going to Washington, D. C., to meet the National Baptist Convention, which meets there the middle of this month. For the last three years I have been holding this question in line on the prohibition question."

Page 927. Moore to Wahrmund says that during the campaign I made it one of my duties to see that not a drop of intoxicants was drunk in the building occupied as headquarters, and I feel sure that manner of campaigning made us votes.

Page 959. S. A. Brewing Association to Andrews: "The law prevents you from paying the poll tax of anyone, but there is no law to prevent your loaning a friend the stipulated amount, so get your friends together and take some concerted action in this respect and we will direct the attention of our State organization to the situation.

Page 970. Mr. Leeds, an agent of the S. A. and A. P. R. R., was assisting in prohibition work. Holmgren writes to Paget: "Wouldn't it be a good plan to ship around by Laredo; and if you would instruct all dealers at Alice to ship via Tex. Mex. R. R., I will do so, and four or five cars per month to meet (?) might cause inquiry, and Mr. L. will have to come across and let others do the fighting.

Paget sends this on to the S. A. Brewing Association, and adds: "The railroad management will not stand for a moment for any such conduct, and if a notification comes from such a high source as the City Brewery or the Lone Star Brewery Mr. Leeds will be brought up with a round turn."

Page 972. Paget, asking for a campaign manager, says: "He must be absolutely sober."

Page 973. Autrey telegraphs to Koehler: "Mr. Eads, local agent of the San Antonio & Pacific Railroad at Alice, is vice president of anti-

Page 1002. Mitchell writes to Texas Brewing Co. for funds. A great number of railroad employees "will have to be paid in order to get them to vote, otherwise they would go ahead with their work."

Page 1033. Paget to Adoue: "If Smith County could be won by an expenditure of $20,000, it would be cheap, as it would be a setback to prohibition."

Page 1076. Paget describes raising of large fund to secure the services of Justice Briggs, Judge Mayberry, and others for antiprohibition work.

Page 1122. Wright to Page: "We will need some election booze, but will write you in regard to that matter later on."

Page 1162. Riggins to C. C. Turner, 27 Williams Street, New York: "We do not understand why you have not received the polling list of Nolan County. I suppose you have received it by this time." * * * Describes a proposed weekly, the Texas Talker: "To talk Texas from a railroad, agricultural, industrial, and investor's standpoint. * * * The plan would be to publish a paper and immediately put out 10 or more canvassers in the counties threatened with prohibition elections. * * * If the subscribers did not have the ready cash, we would send the paper to them on credit. * * * I believe in less than a year the question of literature would be upon a self-sustaining basis in the State. The paper need not be offensively antiprohibition. It could be Democratic in politics and discuss Texas development, resources, etc. Prohibition could be handled as a 'State killer,' as a tax raiser, and as a crime producer, and in such a way as it would appear only incidental, yet conspicuous enough so that the information which we desired in the minds of the public would be seen and read by the people."

Page 1170. It is very important that this poll-tax amendment be defeated, but our work must be done in such a way as not to allow the public to know that we are fighting this matter.

Page 1173. Morgan to Wahrmund says Paget secures polling lists for C. C. Turner, and Turner mails from New York good, wholesome antiprohibition literature direct to the voters

Page 1188. Morgan writes Luedde that Hon. Duncan B. Harrison, who is looking after the interests of the brewers in Washington, speaks in the highest terms of the Hon. Robert Lee Henry * * * and expresses the hope that our interest will give Mr. Henry every assistance in his approaching renomination.

Page 1195. Morgan writes Adoue acknowledging proof of the article by Bishop Potter, which he describes as good educational matter. This in 1904.

Page 1207. Autrey writes Koehler: "I am very much grieved to note the paragraph of Mr. Adoue's letter saying, 'I have received physical demonstration of the insincerity of most of our members.' Reflecting, I know that the charge is true. I well remember the time when the Brewers' Association was first formed and the resolution committing the brewers to the purification of the business and to the aiding of the officers in suppressing and prosecuting crime was submitted by Mr. Adoue. The resolution was sent to Mr. Hamilton for his consideration, with an injunction from Mr. Adoue that he must reflect on it thoroughly and be prepared to attend a meeting at an early date, when the proposed resolution would be considered. * * * We spoke of the sad fact that the hobo saloon and the disreputable places are the best customers of the Texas brewers. * * * I compared the signing of the resolution to the surgeon's knife severing a limb to save the very existence of the individual."

Page 1211. Anheuser-Busch writes to Cetti: "We have had a great deal of experience with medical journals and found as advertising mediums there are but few of any value whatever."

Page 1219. Adoue writes to Cetti: * * * "The question you ask is loaded with dynamite. Labor leaders are diplomats of the first order, and all dealings with them must be handled diplomatically."

Pages 1222–1225. Wahrmund, Morgan, etc., discuss Randolph Churchill; advise giving him $100 to get to Washington to confer with W. W. Price, of the brewers' educational work.

Page 1252. Adoue writes to Wahrmund: "I believe you can suggest a plan by which the breweries can make contributions without coming under the crime indicated in section 5, page 312, and at our next meeting shall submit it to you."

Page 1259. Morgan writes Adoue explaining Oklahoma's voting pro as "due largely to the manner in which the breweries have in the past aided the saloon men to conduct their business in the Territory of Oklahoma; that is to say, the breweries in their greed for trade put every Tom, Dick, and Harry, as well as many a jailbird, in the business by not only furnishing them fixtures, loaning them money for licenses, but even going to the extent of buying lots and building houses." Result, excess of places * * * result, encouragement "in every way possible of the many evils that have brought the saloon business in the bad repute it is in to-day * * * law openly and almost defiantly violated by the saloons by connecting up with gambling, bad women, and many other abuses." This he attributes "to the large concerns who, I regret to say, seem to be willing to go any length to sell a few more kegs of beer." Mentions specifically the Anheuser-Busch Co.

Page 1270. When it is reported that Roosevelt had expressed satisfaction in Oklahoma's going dry Wahrmund suggest that a denial of the report be secured from him, "Report has it that he and our mutual friend, Mr. Adolphus Busch, are close friends. Perhaps we could get at him through that medium."

Page 1308. The Galveston system. No beer to the lawless saloons.

Page 1315. Letter from Busch at Ivy Wall * * *. If you look the whole matter straight in the face, you will have to admit that there is no such thing as drunkenness in this country. Good, healthy beer has long ago weaned off those who heretofore imbibed too much in strong alcoholic drinks. Our people are as sober as the people in any civilized country in the world. With the hero of Appomattox we exclaim, "Let us have peace."

Page 1320. It is stated that for some time past the business of the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association was being conducted by the clerks; that the entire time and attention of the officials was being devoted in effort to offset the inroads of prohibition.

Page 1331. "The Anheuser-Busch methods and people in the past have done more than all the rest put together to cause the trouble in this State (and elsewhere)." * * * Weeden to Cetti, 1908.

Page 1377. "We have some good campaign matter coming directly from Bryan that we will use for all it is worth. It is to the effect that if a prohibition plank is put in the platform he would not accept the nomination, and should the Democratic Party adopt a pro plank he was of the opinion the party would in 12 months be no larger than the Prohibition Party is now. Strong declarations of this nature from Bryan, who is the idol of the Texas democracy, should make us votes." Morgan Dallas Brewery, 1908.

Page 1400. Adoue (Paget) writes to Fox: "Yours of the 22d instant received requesting that I send you facts and figures relative to the work of the Texas Brewers' Association in our State, which I will gladly do, subject to the approval of the chairman. This, however, I must say: If I write the history of the association, it will make a strong antisaloon document."

The association issued May 20 and 22, 1904, two circulars which were published in nearly all the newspapers in the State (see copies inclosed), and had the members of the association been sincere the Antisaloon League would never have made any progress in Texas, but unfortunately only the chairman of the association undertook to execute the promises made to the public. * * * No one ever did anything to assist him. All their energies appear to be expended in an effort to sell one more keg of beer.

Page 1402. Prince, secretary of the American Brewery Association, writes, Mr. Paget's letter to Mr. Hugh F. Fox covers the ground exactly, and what has been done by the breweries regarding the sale of that keg of beer in Texas years ago is now pursued in the city of New York, so you see the only chance for brewers to become real good will be when they are in the same condition as what they say of a good Indian.

Page 1504. J. F. Wolters writes: "The members of the barbers' union come in daily contact with more voters than any other class of labor. While they wait upon their customers they usually engage them in conversation. * * * While they may not in all instances be able to exercise influence over their customers, they can at least give us valuable information, and in instances where they find them against us if they will advise Mr. Louis Crelling, the local secretary of the local anti-State-wide prohibition organization, it is more than possible that we can find some influential citizens who can bring some influence to bear * * *."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, some time ago Hon. Lowry Humes, a Federal district attorney, brought suits in the Federal court at Pittsburgh, Pa., against the United States Brewers' Association, the Altoona Brewing Co., and others. The charge in these cases was the violation of the Federal corrupt-practices act and certain other laws. When the case came to trial the defendants filed what is known as a plea of nolle contendere, which is practically a plea of guilty, and paid fines totaling some $70,000. Mr. Humes submitted a memorandum to assist the court in arriving at the amount of the fine. This memorandum contains a summary of the evidence, showing the activities of the United States Brewing Association and its associates in the politics of the country, involving nearly every State in the Union. I have that memorandum here, and I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MEMORANDUM FOR THE COURT IN THE CASES OF THE UNITED STATES V. UNITED STATES BREWERS' ASSOCIATION ET AL. AND UNITED STATES V. ALTOONA BREWING CO. ET AL.

In the case of the United States v. United States Brewers' Association et al., the indictment includes as defendants the United States Brewers' Association, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, and all of the brewing companies of the State of Pennsylvania that are members of the United States Brewers' Association.

In the case of the United States v. the Altoona Brewing Co. et al. the defendants include those brewing companies that in 1914 were members of the Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association, itself not being a corporation but only a voluntary association.

In each of these indictments the defendants have been divided into four classes, as follows:

First. Those brewing corporations one or more of whose officers was an officer of either the United States Brewers' Association or the Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association. This representation brought home to those brewing companies notice as to the purposes and the activities of the respective associations as well as notice as to the real purpose for which the funds which they contributed to those associations were actually used.

Second. Those defendant brewing companies whose contributions to the United States Brewers' Association and the Pennsylvania State Brewing Association were sufficiently large to in itself put the defendant on notice that the funds thus contributed to those associations were not intended solely for the ordinary trade purposes of a trade association.

It is alleged by the Government that the amount of those contributions was sufficiently large to charge those defendants with the obligation of ascertaining the purpose for which those contributions were used by the respective brewing associations, and that on this fact in itself, aside from all other evidence, rests the presumption that they had knowledge of the purposes of the association and the manner in which the funds which they contributed to them were used.

Third. Those defendant brewing companies who alleged that they joined and paid dues or assessments to the respective associations on the theory that they were trade organizations whose contributions, in so far as the Government has been able to ascertain and prove, were not sufficiently large to in itself put them on notice that the organizations to which they contributed said sums were not ordinary trade associations.

As to those, it is not the purpose of the Government to admit a want of guilt on their part, nor to vindicate their course of action in connection with their membership in these respective associations, but the Government does admit that at this time it is not able to satisfactorily prove by competent evidence that the contention of the defendants is untrue. The Government, therefore, recognizing the character and extent of proof necessary in the trial of a case, purposes to enter nolle prosses as to this class of defendants, with the distinct understanding on the part of the defendants that any of these nolle prosses may be taken off at any time by the United States attorney if satisfactory evidence is secured to establish the guilt of said defendants.

Fourth. This class consists of seven defendants, namely, the Uhl Brewing Co., Emmerling Brewing Co., New Lebanon Brewing Co., Clearfield Brewing Co., and the Altoona Brewing Co., which have already been nolle prossed by reason of the fact that since the indictment has been returned it has been discovered that they are not corporations and consequently do not come within the prohibition of section 83 of the Criminal Code, and the Meadville Brewing Co. and the Mercer County Brewing Co., which have gone out of business and which have been nolle prossed for that reason.

It is interesting to note in connection with the consideration of the facts which the court seeks in order that sentence may be intelligently imposed that the United States Brewers' Association, realizing the method by which their funds were raised and expended, sought to secure legal advice as to the rights of corporations to make contributions for political purposes. They caused their general counsel to prepare a digest of the laws of the various States of the Union which might affect such corporation activity, and when this digest was prepared it was mailed to Mr. Hugh F. Fox, the secretary of the United States Brewers' Association, with the following letter of transmittal:

"MY DEAR MR. FOX: I hand you herewith prepared booklet showing by States where it is and is not permissible for corporations to make contributions for any political campaign.

"Apparently the State of Illinois is the only one that is immune on this question.

"The original of this was handed to me by Oscar Schmidt, of the Schlitz Brewing Co.

"No doubt the contents of this will be valuable information to you."

It is interesting to note that in the preparation of this booklet or digest, section 83 of the Criminal Code, the section out of which this indictment grows, was not mentioned but was apparently entirely overlooked. It is therefore likely that the defendants were ignorant of the existence of this statute, as they now allege. It is needless, however, to say the ignorance of the law is no excuse.

A brief summary of the facts out of which the indictment in these cases grew is as follows:

The United States Brewers' Association was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York in 1877, and amended its charter in 1903. Its membership consists of between eight and nine hundred brewing companies in the United States, most of them corporations. The records of this association explain a portion of their organization as follows:

"We have our national association, the United States Brewers' Association; we have in every State our local State association. Then we have in the States local associations, and in some cases there are individuals who do not belong to the State association but they will to the national; then there are some who will not belong to the national but they will to the State association."

Among the Pennsylvania officers of the United States Brewers' Association we find the following:

John Gardiner, connected with the Continental Brewing Co. of Philadelphia, one of the defendants, was a trustee and was also the head of the organization bureau of the association.

Edward A. Schmidt, of the Schmidt & Sons Brewing Co., was an executive officer and also a trustee of the United States Brewers' Association.

G. W. Bergner, of the Bergner & Engel Brewing Co., was a trustee of the United States Brewers' Association.

Prior to the spring of 1913 the United States Brewers' Association showed great activity in political affairs in many States. To illustrate, in reporting the activities of the association to the members of the association, Hugh F. Fox, secretary, claims a membership of 523, representing 80 per cent of the entire brewing business of the country, and that in organization work in 1908 the United States Brewers' Association had taken an active part in "educating the voters" in 25 States, including Pennsylvania; that preliminary organization work had been started in 9 States, and that the association had "won nearly every contest in which we were engaged."

The records of the association clearly indicates, as early as 1908, that the political work of the association was in the hands of a bureau known as the organization bureau of the United States Brewers' Association. At the head of this bureau was Mr. John Gardiner, of the Continental Brewing Co., of Philadelphia. This bureau submitted regularly monthly reports to the association showing the nature and extent of their activities in the various States of the Union, and in reporting the situation in Pennsylvania in the report of May 1, 1908, the organization bureau says: "Our people are well organized in that State."

Some of the methods of the organization bureau are disclosed in a report to the president of the United States Brewers' Association dated June 1, 1908, which says:

"Since the organization of the bureau 36 of the 46 States of the Union have been visited by representatives of our bureau. * * * Manufacturers' and dealers' clubs of the allied industries are in active working order in 19 States; and also M. and E. clubs in Indiana, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, which are State associations. Traveling men, liberty leagues, and personal-liberty leagues have been organized and are in working order in 8 States."

The same report, in referring to Illinois, says:

"This committee will take up active work for the legislature and also in looking after nominations for Congress."

Relative to Pennsylvania, the report says:

"The large manufacturers' and dealers' club for the State of Pennsylvania, with headquarters at Philadelphia, has been organized, with branches at various cities in the State, and has done effective work."

The November, 1908, report of the organization bureau says with reference to Pennsylvania:

"We assisted in the formation of the Manufacturers and Dealers' Association in Philadelphia for the State of Pennsylvania, which has done very effective work under the guidance of the Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association, and their able president, Mr. John Gardiner. Outside of that, we have done no work in Pennsylvania, nor have we been called on for any."

The annual report of the bureau for the year 1908 says:

"Among other things that the bureau has accomplished in the past year is the solidifying of union labor in the United States in our cause."

The records of the association in 1908 show the outline of the plan to include, among other things, political organization, to include State and congressional campaign organization bureau, and Washington bureau, and points out the value of the labor vote to a political organization.

Under date of May 11, 1908, the United States Brewers' Association directed a letter to all delinquent members, in which they stated, among other things:

"The organization bureau, which is a new and expensive departure, has done and continues to do most effective work in some 20 different States."

In 1909 an organization was formed within the membership of the United States Brewers' Association known as the Interstate Executive Association, and the committee which had the matter in charge made the following recommendations:

"We recommend that a permanent organization be and is hereby perfected of the executive officers, attorneys, and secretaries of the various State and local organizations, and such other officers as may be designated by said various State and local associations, to be known as the Interstate Executive Association; that the officers of such association shall be president, vice president, and secretary; that such officers shall hold their respective offices for the term of one year and until their successors are elected and qualified, and we recommend that John Gardiner, of Philadelphia, be elected as president."

This association was to have and did have quarterly meetings. The report of the committee further sets forth:

"The general purpose and object of this association shall be to interchange ideas, information, and literature bearing upon educational and publicity methods, trade problems, campaign management, etc."

The report further sets forth:

"5. Campaign management and legislation is largely a matter for each State individually, but we believe in a general outline under the auspices of the National Brewers' Association and in a speakers' bureau, to be organized along national lines."

In 1910, in a report to the trustees of the United States Brewers' Association entitled "Activities of the United States Brewers' Association," we find, among other things, the following:

"The organization bureau: This department, which is our fighting field force, is financed by a voluntary fund. It has taken an active part during the past two years in State and local campaigns throughout the country. No less than 46 States and Territories have had the personal service of the bureau. The statement with regard to the elections of November 8, 1910, which has gone out to our members, indicates the extent of the recent work. There were 27 State campaigns in which we were interested, and we won substantial victories in all except 1 of them. Surely this speaks for itself."

And further this report says:

"Our secretary is a member of all of the national societies which have anything to do with public health, political science, social science and economics, criminology, charities, and school hygiene. The alliance thus gained with public men has proved most valuable."

And again, under the heading of "Federal Relations," the report says:

"Our counsel has guarded our interest in the matter of Federal legislation with most remarkable success. During the last two sessions in Congress over 200 bills adverse to our interest have been introduced, many of which have had the backing of the entire prohibition and temperance organizations in this country. Only one measure affecting our interest has passed Congress in this period, and that went through with our assent. You can readily imagine what this has meant in winning and keeping friends in congressional districts. It is also literally true that Congress has been kept from doubling the tax on beer by our unaided efforts.

"These, of course, are confidential matters."

About the same time there was submitted the following under the title, "Skeleton of Reorganization Plan."

"The various activities of this association naturally group themselves as follows:

"(1) Political organization. This includes State campaigns, congressional campaigns, the Washington bureau, and the organization of voters.

"I shall not attempt to deal with this department except to say that it must be organized with a view of getting as much work as possible out of other people. The problem will be how to keep up the interest and activity of affiliated bodies, upon which we must rely, at a minimum cost."

And, further, this plan sets forth, among other things, the following:

"Recognizing our natural limitations, we must, first of all, preach and teach the teachers. This includes the colleges, libraries, newspapers, magazine instructors in economics and physiology, and the men who are leaders of thought in their community. With the coming of woman suffrage this is more than ever necessary. We must supply campaign material on demand and assist our members and leaders in all matters relating to publicity and newspaper work.

"The scope is enormous, and the value of this department is limited only by the amount of money that the association can spend upon it."

And under the head of "Labor" the plan, among other things, says:

"In addition to this the labor bureau might be of very great value in our political organization by establishing a permanent working connection with the other labor bodies who make up the American Federation of Labor."

The plan contemplates a complete separation between the executive and political departments in the following words:

"The executive department should have the general oversight and direction of the work of all the other departments except the political department."

And as to the necessities of the executive department the plan declares:

"This would require a force of about 15 employees in addition to the heads of departments, the field staff, and the men employed in the political department."

In a call for a meeting of the Interstate Executive Association, under date of December 6, 1916, Hugh F. Fox, the secretary, says:

"The 'deliberations' will take the character of an experience meeting in connection with the recent campaign, and a survey of the field of action with a view to the work that is to be done in the near future."

At about this time Mr. Percy Andrews became president of this Interstate Executive Association. One of the representatives of the organization bureau of the United States Brewers' Association said in his report to the head of that bureau in referring to a particular State:

"I went over the State more with a view of meeting with the most influential labor men and in securing their support now and in the fight that may come; and I am sure that, if it is necessary, we can muster to our support all the labor men in the State, with one or two exceptions, and they believe they can deliver the union-labor vote."

I call this to the court's attention in order that the court may in some degree appreciate the effort those defendants and their associates have made to control every activity that can be of political value to them.

One of the field men, who was using this connection with the German-American Alliance for the purpose of promoting the political work of these brewing companies, said in his report to the organization bureau:

"Financial support necessary. Any attempt to bring about a German State organization must have financial support. I believe that such should come from the State Brewers' Association, and, as I have already indicated, should not be given direct but might pass through the hands of a middleman—perhaps Mr. Wolters, of Houston, or Dr. Horner, of Philadelphia."

In the late winter or early spring of 1913 a meeting of all the brewing companies in the United States was called at Chicago, and as a result of that meeting it was agreed that contracts should be secured from the various brewing companies providing for the payment into the treasury of the United States Brewers' Association of a special assessment of 3 cents a barrel on the annual production of the brewery. These contracts were not to become effective until signatures were secured covering an aggregate barrelage of 25,000,000 barrels, or $750,000. These contracts were for a period of five years. The 25,000,000 minimum was greatly exceeded.

In October of that year an executive session of the United States Brewers' Association was held at Atlantic City, and there was organized at that time an association known as the National Association of Commerce and Labor. At that time a contract was entered into between the United States Brewers' Association and Mr. Percy Andreae, by which he was to receive an annual salary of $40,000 for the purpose of taking charge of and organizing and conducting the National Association of Commerce and Labor. The records show that the name was selected because of its similarity with that of one of the departments of the Federal Government.

In a speech at the time of the organization of this association, Mr. Andreae, who had been engaged in similar work in the State of Ohio, held Ohio up as an example to be emulated, and stated his purpose to extend the principles of the Ohio organization throughout the country. Among other things he said:

"The value of this work to the industry in each State wherein it is accomplished will be very appreciable, for it is impossible to obtain and use, as I have described, the political knowledge concerning congressional districts in any State without at the same time acquiring the same data concerning the counties and senatorial districts of that State, for the simple reason that a congressional district is made up of Representative and senatorial districts, and you can not know the conditions of the larger unit without ascertaining those of the smaller units of which it is composed. It will therefore rest with the interest in each particular State to put to particular use the knowledge obtained concerning these smaller units in order to accomplish within that State what we have accomplished in Ohio. They will find that nearly half the expense of organization within the State for that purpose has thus been taken off their hands by the national organization."

The financial activities of the National Association of Commerce and Labor, in carrying out this comprehensive plan of Mr. Andreae, are most interesting. During the year 1914 the United States Brewers' Association turned over to Mr. Andreae the sum of $330,138. The Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association paid him $90,000. These items and miscellaneous contributions which he received aggregated in that year $525,116.28. The only activities of Mr. Andreae and his associates were political in nature. They participated extensively in numerous State campaigns concerning themselves and using their funds to influence the election of governors, lieutenant governors, United States Senators, Members of Congress, and members of State legislative bodies. Some of the money was spent directly on conducting State campaigns for State and Federal officers in various States, and perhaps one of the best illustrations is to be found in the State of Iowa, where a three-cornered agreement was entered into with the local political organization in the State of Iowa by Messrs. Andreae, John Gardiner, A. Sunstein, the treasurer of the Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association, by the terms of which they were to pay into the Iowa campaign fund the sum of $37,500, and the local political organization was to raise within the State of Iowa an equal sum. This $37,500 was to be paid in three equal payments. A third of this amount, $12,500, was to be paid by Andreae; a third, $12,500, was to be paid by John Gardiner, of the organization bureau of the United States Brewers' Association; and a third thereof, or $12,500, by A. Sunstein, the treasurer of the Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association; and this money was in fact paid to the political organization of the State of Iowa for political purposes. As each of these payments fell due Mr. Sunstein turned over $4,166.67 to Mr. Gardiner; Mr. Gardiner added on an equal amount and forwarded the total of $8,383.35 to Mr. Andreae, and Mr. Andreae then added his third and delivered it to the political manager in the State of Iowa.

We find that in almost every instance the records show that when the Andreae bureau, or the organization bureau of the United States Brewers' Association, contributed funds to a political campaign, there was an agreement by which a sum equal to one-half of the contribution of the United States Brewers' Association was to be paid for the same political purpose by the Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association.

In his efforts to promote these various political campaigns, Mr. Andreae caused to be organized an organization bureau of the German-American Alliance, and used this organization to further his political purposes. This was done through Mr. Joseph Heller, of Indianapolis, and in the year 1914 alone he expended for this purpose the sum of $35,633.41.

The extent of the operations of the United States Brewers' Association in 1914 reached startling proportions. Because of the alleged destruction of records, the Government has no assurance that it has a complete record of the funds raised and distributed by that association. We do, however, have an absolute record of the collection by the United States Brewers' Association in 1913 of $755,385.18, a considerable portion of which remained in the treasury of the association at the close of its fiscal year.

In 1914 we have an absolute record of collections aggregating at least $999,300.88. How much more was collected during that year, of which we have no knowledge because of the destruction of the association records, we can make no estimate. We do know, however, that the bank accounts which we have thus far succeeded in discovering show an aggregate in the neighborhood of a million and a half of dollars.

The Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association was one of the associated organizations which constituted the general scheme of the defendant brewing companies and their associates to control the political affairs of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The Government has little documentary evidence as to their activities. In fact, the Government is quite ready to admit that the operations of both the United States Brewers' Association and the Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association were, so far as the individual brewing companies in Pennsylvania are concerned, really part of the same big scheme. This association was originally a trade organization and was not incorporated. The big Pennsylvania brewing companies who controlled this association diverted it from its original purpose and used it as the basis of their political activities in order to cover up their corporate political activities in order that they might conceal them behind this unincorporated association. They had the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania divided into districts and each district assigned to one of the members of the board of trustees.

The defendant companies through this association undertook to control the nomination and election of practically every public officer elected within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania from governor down, including Members of Congress and United States Senators. At a conference called by its representatives in 1914, candidates for legislature and State senate, for Members of Congress, for United States Senator, and for governor were elected, and not only the individual effort but the moneys contributed to this association by the brewing companies who have entered pleas in this case were used to put through the slate thus selected.

All the records of the Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association were, it is alleged, destroyed. As a result the Government is not in a position to definitely establish the total amount of money that was raised and expended by these companies in 1914 but the Government does know, and the records of one bank account establish, and there may be other bank accounts which the Government has not been fortunate enough to discover, that there was paid into the treasury of the Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association for its political purposes in 1914 the sum of $349,992.11, and that during that same year, in its effort to elect the slate which it had selected, expended from this one bank account the sum of $346,696.91. I cite these figures because of the fact that the Government has absolute knowledge of them. Whether or not these sums were supplemented by other funds, I am not in a position to state. The very fact that the records of the association were destroyed, as your honor already knows from the evidence in certain contempt cases which have been heard by the court, warrants the conclusion that there may have been other funds of which the Government has no knowledge.

The following is a copy of the contract entered into by one of the defendant corporations, and is the same form that was used by all of the companies who entered into the agreement, decided upon at the Chicago conference:

"To the United States Brewers' Association, New York:

"Memorandum of agreement made and entered into this 19th day of June, 1913, by and between the undersigned for and on behalf of himself or itself, his or its personal representatives, successors, and assigns, hereinafter called the 'brewer,' and the United States Brewers' Association, a membership corporation, duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of New York, hereinafter called the 'association.'

"Whereas the association is about to undertake certain work of vital importance to the brewing industry, which will require the outlay of a large sum of money during the next five years.

"Now, this agreement witnessed, that the brewer, in consideration of the premises and of the sum of $1 to the said brewer, duly paid by the association, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, it is hereby covenanted and agreed to and with the association to pay to said association the sum of 3 cents per barrel upon the amount of sales to his or its customers yearly, measured in barrels each year, for a period of five years from the 1st day of April, 1913, payable in such installments each year and at such times in each year as the association shall from time to time designate. Such contributions of 3 cents per barrel for each year during a period of five years shall constitute the brewer a member of said association during the life of this agreement without additional cost, provided always, nevertheless, that this agreement shall be and become null and void and of no effect unless on or before the 4th day of October, 1913, the association shall have received similar agreements duly executed and delivered by other brewers in the United States to the association pledging yearly for a period of five years 3 cents a barrel each year upon an aggregate of 25,000,000 barrels. All of such agreements shall be similar in form to this agreement.

"Witness the hand and seal of the said brewer.

"THE ERIE BREWING CO.,
"Per ED. HEUER, General Manager.

"In presence of—
"F. A. Brevillin."

Sales for the year ending April 1, 1913, 101,353⅓ barrels.

For the purpose of uniformity and convenience, the sales for the preceding 12 months will be taken as the basis of this calculation. Thus the payment for 1913 should be upon the amount of beer sold during the 12 months from April 1, 1912, to March 31, 1913.

Schedule of basis of dues of Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association:

First 20,000 barrels or part thereof, 2 cents per barrel.
Next 30,000 barrels or part thereof, 2½ cents per barrel.
Next 50,000 barrels or part thereof, 3 cents per barrel.
Next 75,000 barrels or part thereof, 3½ cents per barrel.
Next 100,000 barrels or part thereof, 4 cents per barrel.
Next 125,000 barrels or part thereof and over, 5 cents per barrel.

Mr. STERLING obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me to make a request for printing certain matter in the RECORD?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have an editorial from one of the leading newspapers in the East, which I should like to have inserted in the RECORD, and also a recent article by Prof. Irving Fisher, with reference to the conservation phase of this question, which I should also like to put into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the North American, Philadelphia, Tuesday, July 3, 1917.]

THE HAND ON THE SPIGOT.

Americans in most States have witnessed spectacles of legislative dishonesty and degradation due to liquor influence, but the present scandalous developments in Washington set a new mark in discredit as well as in magnitude. When a State legislature sacrifices the public interest to serve the special privilege of booze, decent citizens comfort themselves with the thought that the evil is of local and transitory significance. But when liquor reveals the power to paralyze the will of Congress, to enlist the open advocacy of the national administration, and to dictate the Government's policy in time of war, the whole Nation is profoundly concerned.

If anyone feels that our expressions are unduly harsh, let him glance at the astounding record of political maneuvering and false pretense which now seems about to culminate in complete surrender to rum.

National prohibition for the period of the war, or at least drastic reduction in the manufacture of intoxicants, became a vital issue as soon as the United States entered the conflict. It was obvious that the Nation must exert all its energies and eliminate all controllable wastes in order to achieve victory, and the experience of other belligerents showed that the minimizing of the drain of liquor upon the Nation's material and human resources was the first requisite in promoting efficiency. The present British premier declared that of the three enemies of his country—Germany, Austria, and drink—the last was the most menacing; and in Great Britain, where the liquor interests had been all-powerful, and where the idea of "personal liberty" has dominated the laws for centuries, both the industry and individual rights have been severely restricted.

In the United States, where four-fifths of the area and three-fifths of the population were already under prohibitory laws, suppression of liquor suggested itself as one of the first measures of strengthening national defense, and the project was assured of the support of a majority of the people. Existence of a food shortage, threatening to cause real privation, added immeasurable pressure to the demand.

The attitude of Congress reflected public sentiment and the palpable needs of the situation; and yet the most decisive expressions of judgment were mysteriously reversed—not so much by the desperate efforts of the booze lobby as by the direct influence of President Wilson and his administration.

Thus, when the caucus of Democratic House Members indorsed war prohibition by an overwhelming vote, the action was promptly rescinded upon warning from the White House that only legislation initiated by the administration should be considered. And when the Senate added to the espionage bill a rider forbidding the waste of foodstuffs in making liquor, the administration did not relax its efforts until the clause was stricken out. A dozen bills, resolutions, and amendments of similar import were struck down at the same inspiration.

Hopeless of continuing unchecked during the war their weakening and debauching traffic, the liquor interests sought a crafty compromise. If some sort of prohibition was unavoidable, let the making of spirits be stopped, they said, while the manufacturer of beer and wine was permitted. This would satisfy the public, it was believed, while having no effect upon the consumption of liquor and very little upon the waste of foodstuffs; for with 300,000,000 gallons of spirits in storage the market could be supplied for two years at least, and the breweries would continue, as before, to consume the people's food, beer utilizing vastly more edible material than whisky.

The alarming official warnings of food shortage insisted that the people must undertake the most minute economies, yet the whole power of the administration was put behind a proposal to perpetuate the systematic waste of stupendous quantities of nutritious products. The scheme of the brewers was adopted by the Senate Finance Committee, which offered an amendment to the food bill placing prohibitive taxes upon food materials used in making distilled spirits only.

But the device was too transparently dishonest to succeed without a contest. The people had been convinced by the officially emphasized facts that they must eat less of their accustomed diet and must practice novel and rigid economies; and they could not reconcile these imperative demands with the indorsement of the greatest single item of food waste. Preponderant public sentiment and the clearest requirements of logic and food conservation were obeyed, therefore, when the House 10 days ago amended the bill so as to prohibit the use of food materials in the making of any and all alcoholic beverages. Only 5 votes out of 370 were cast against the measure with this provision.

Popular judgment could hardly have been more decisive, but the rum interests had two other lines of defense—in the Senate and the White House—and they concentrated upon strengthening these. Their success presents perhaps the most remarkable exhibition of the power of special privilege ever witnessed in American public affairs.

A large number of Senators represent prohibition States, and it was predicted that that body would not attempt to overturn the overwhelming decision of the House. The majority sentiment was expressed in Senator GORE'S amendment prohibiting the use of nonperishable food materials in making alcoholic beverages and authorizing the President to stop the use of perishable products also, and to commandeer existing supplies of spirits. Nevertheless, liquor and administration influence united to break down the demand.

After three days the result was disclosed in a revised amendment adopted by the Subcommittee on Agriculture. This was an astonishing combination. It took over the House prohibition of the waste of foods in liquor, but added the provision that the President might permit the "limited use" of the people's food in making booze, "whenever in the judgment of the President the public interest would be subserved thereby."

It was a victory for the rum interests, but more embarrassing than a defeat, for it put upon Mr. Wilson the responsibility of canceling war prohibition after enactment—Congress would turn off the spigot and leave it to him to turn it on again, if he dared, as a means of "subserving the public interest"! The situation would have been farcical if it had not been so serious for the Nation.

But the next day there was another shift. The Agricultural Committee repudiated its subcommittee's preposterous "compromise" and reported an amendment prohibiting the use of foodstuffs in any alcoholic beverages, but authorizing the President to permit the utilization of perishable fruits. The effect of this would be to prohibit distilling and brewing, but to protect the wine industry.

By this time the farce had become ghastly, and President Wilson was compelled to make his tacit support of the liquor campaign open and active. The Senate was not amenable to confidential hints and recommendations; it was necessary to crack the whip of administrative coercion. So on Friday the leaders were summoned to the White House and informed plainly that there must be no interference with beer or wine, the arguments being that complete prohibition would cause public discontent and would deprive the Government of large revenues needed for the war.

The result was a new amendment (a) forbidding the use of food materials in the manufacture of distilled alcoholic beverages and (b) authorizing the President to limit, regulate, or prohibit, at his discretion, the use of such products in beer and wine. Naturally the President wanted Congress to settle the matter; he did not relish the prospect of having to interfere with "great industries" himself. But he consented to the arrangement.

This, however, was only temporary. The President was determined to relieve himself of the responsibility, and the liquor interests were equally determined to block all prohibition if they could. Both influences brought about another conference on Saturday, the result being agreement upon an amendment stopping the manufacture of distilled spirits and making no mention at all of beer or wine.

Having won this great victory through the President's rescue of the breweries, the liquor interests immediately planned to save the whisky industry also, and a determined fight is under way to kill the project of authorizing the President to commandeer for Government use in munitions the existing stocks of spirits. Since there is a two-year supply in bond, the net result would be that war prohibition would be reduced to the shabbiest of false pretense; for the market would still be flooded with whisky and the making of beer and wine would continue without restriction.

A curious feature of the situation is that President Wilson by his efforts to avoid the placing upon him of responsibility for the continuance of the liquor traffic unhampered during the war, has succeeded only in focusing public attention upon himself as the most powerful ally of the system. For the record shows incontestably that Congress, left to itself, would have taken the course dictated by the sentiment of the majority of the American people and by the urgent requirements of national efficiency, and that only the determined stand of the President overcame the judgment of the Nation's Representatives. It is his hand that keeps open the rum spigot.

This fact can not be minimized or obscured. The motives that have impelled Mr. Wilson to take this extraordinary course are undoubtedly sincere; that he thinks he is acting for the best interests of the Nation, as well as for the interests of the liquor traffic, can not be questioned.

But the unwholesome episode shows once more the peculiarities of the judgment which the American people are asked to regard as infallible. For it is President Wilson's opinion that patriotism requires them to submit to drastic restrictions in the matter of the food which sustains life, while the supplies their war-diet economies may save are drained away through the distillery, the brewery, and the saloon.

HOW MUCH FOOD CONSERVATION IS POSSIBLE FROM WAR-TIME PROHIBITION AND HOW GREATLY IS IT NEEDED—LIQUOR USES UP 94,000,000 BUSHELS OF GRAIN A YEAR.

[By Irving Fisher, professor, Yale University.]

Grain used by brewers, 1916.

[Reported by Department of Agriculture 1917; figures given to the nearest 100,000 bushels.]

	Bushels.
Barley	52,400,000
Corn	13,600,000
Rice	2,400,000
Total	68,400,000

Grain used by distillers, 1816.

[Internal revenue report includes that for industrial alcohol; figures given to the nearest 100,000 bushels.]

	Bushels.
Corn	32,100,000
Barley	4,500,000
Rye	3,100,000
Total	39,700,000

Total grain used by distillers and brewers combined.

[Including that distilled for industrial alcohol.]

	Bushels.
Distillers	39,700,000
Brewers	68,400,000.
Total	108,100,000

Negligible amounts of other grains (mostly oats and wheat) are also used.

The quantity of grain used by the distilleries in the manufacture of industrial alcohol is not exactly known, but in 1916 the total quantity of distilled spirits for denaturing, manufacturing, and scientific purposes was 87,000,000 gallons, and the remainder presumably as alcoholic beverages, 162,000,000 gallons. In other words, about a third of the total was used industrially. As a much larger proportion of the alcohol from molasses is used industrially than is the case with that from grain, the fraction of the grain so used was probably less than one-third. In other words, the grain used from manufactured alcoholic beverages was more than two-thirds of the total of 39,700,000 bushels, and therefore more than 26,000,000 bushels.

Total grain used in production of alcoholic beverages.

	Bushels.
For distilled liquors	26,000,000
For beer	68,400,000
Total	94,400,000

These 94,000,000 bushels consisting mostly of (about) 55,000,000 bushels of barley at 48 pounds per bushel, and (about) 35,000,000 bushels of corn, rice, and rye at 56 pounds per bushel, make over 4,600,000,000 pounds of grain.

HOW THIS WASTE COULD BE SAVED IN BREAD.

This grain could be exported, or better, used to eke out our own bread supply by mixing with wheat flour and thus releasing the equivalent amount of wheat for export.

It is easy, for any cook, to mix corn with wheat flour up to 10 per cent. In the Mellon Institute, in Pittsburgh, where bread experiments are being made, mixtures have been successful up to 50 per cent, and fairly successful even up to 66 per cent. Barley can be mixed with wheat flour up to 20 per cent by any cook, and up to a higher percentage, given the requisite knowledge and skill. Mr. Hoover recently had in his rooms bread containing 20 per cent barley, which could not be detected by its appearance to the eye or by its taste, from the original wheat bread. This will probably be a popular form of war bread.

HOW MUCH BREAD COULD BE SAVED.

A pound of grain makes about a pound of bread; for the 25 to 30 per cent of the grain removed by milling is almost exactly replaced in the bread by other ingredients—milk, water, salt, etc.

Thus alcoholic beverages divert from bread making the equivalent of 4,600,000,000 one-pound loaves of bread per annum, or about twelve and one-half million 1-pound loaves per day.

The cessation of the brewing and distilling of alcoholic beverages would thus enable us to export these twelve and one-half million 1-pound loaves of bread per day. Even if we make a much larger allowance for the industrial alcohol than we have, the figure will exceed 11,000,000 loaves.

HOW FAR DO BREWERS' AND DISTILLERS' GRAINS HELP THE HUMAN FOOD SUPPLY.

It is true that "brewers' grains" and "distillers' grains"—the waste from the production of alcoholic liquors—while they can not be used directly for human food, contain food value for cattle. When they are fed to cattle, part of their food value can be recovered for human food in the form of meat or milk.

The brewers claim that 35 per cent of the original grain is left in the form of brewers' grains. An English statement by Lord Devenport gives the figure in England as 25 per cent. The discrepancy is explainable by the fact that the brewers' 35 per cent is by volume, not by weight, as it should be Only a fraction of this is recoverable in milk and only a very small fraction in meat.

We should measure the results in food units. The food unit is the calory, which is also a unit of heating power or energy-giving power.

As we have just seen barley, after brewing, leaves behind about a third of its weight in dried brewers' grains. As a given weight of these grains possesses only three-fourths the food value of the same weight of barley, it follows that only about one-fourth (i. e., three-fourths of one-third) of the original food value is left for cattle feed (a more exact calculation gives the result as 28 per cent).

Similarly, corn, after distilling, leaves behind somewhat less than a third of its weight in dried distillers' grains. As a given weight of these grains possesses nine-tenths of the food value of the same weight of corn it follows that three-tenths (i. e., nine-tenths of one-third) of the original food value, is left for cattle feed (this also, when more exactly calculated, works out at 28 per cent).

When the brewers and distillers' grains are turned into meat, about nine-tenths of the food value is lost in the process. This one-tenth which is recovered is therefore one-tenth of 28 per cent of the original grain, or less than 3 per cent of the food value in the original barley and corn.

If the grains are used for milk production, a much larger recovery is secured—about two-thirds of the value of the brewers and distillers' grains; i. e., two-thirds of 28 per cent, or about 20 per cent of the original food value.

If we count the meat (or milk) thus recovered in terms of equivalent bread the saving from stopping the manufacture of alcoholic beverages would be 3 per cent (or 20 per cent) less than 12,500,000 loaves—roughly 12,000,000 (or 10,000,000) loaves—let us say 11,000,000.

"MILLER'S OFFAL."

These recoveries however, must in their turn be partly offset; for the manufacture of liquor prevents the making of "miller's offal," amounting usually to about 28 per cent by weight (abroad usually about 40 per cent) of the original grain, which would be created as a by-product if the grain were milled into flour.

These figures for miller's offal relate to wheat and may possibly be different for barley or corn. But the net result would be to raise slightly the net wastage figure (10,000,000 to 12,000,000 loaves) above obtained.

We conclude that 11,000,000 loaves is a fair estimate of the bread supply we are now drinking up.

It should be observed that three-fourths of this food waste is from of the grain waste from alcoholic beverages, we next ask, How important food wasters is erroneous.

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES NOT PROPERLY FOODS.

No account is here taken of the food value in beer nor of the calories (of little or no use in the human organism) of the alcohol in beer and spirits. As these food and heat values can not be expended without at the same time poisoning the human system with alcohol, it is only technically correct to count even the food value of beer as a real part of the food of the Nation and, according to the best physiological authorities, it is not even technically correct to count the heat value of alcohol as such. It was for these reasons that the American Medical Association at its meeting this month in New York formally condemned alcoholic beverages.

ARE 11,000,000 LOAVES A DAY WORTH COUNTING?

Having secured the figure 11,000,000 loaves as a conservative estimate of the grain waste from alcoholic beverages, we next ask, How important to the Nation is this item?

The distillers and brewers, in full page advertisements, have recently been trying to belittle such waste as a small percentage of the grain crop, although a few years ago they were magnifying their use of grain as an important part of the farmers' market. The grain crop is not the right basis of comparison. Yet even in relation to the grain crop the waste is nearly 2 per cent. The grain crop includes feeds for horses, cattle, swine, poultry, etc., as well as exports. Prof. Sherman, in "Food Products," points out (p. 259) that about nine-tenths of the corn crop is consumed on the farm, and of the one-tenth which is sold not all is used for human food; also (p. 264) that only about one-twentieth of the oat crop is used by milling industries, including that used in breakfast cereals. Only about one-third of the rye crop is made into flour.

The distillers in 1916 consumed over 1 per cent of the total corn consumption by man and beast in the United States, 2 per cent of the total barley consumption, 8 per cent of the total rye consumption. The brewers used over 6 per cent of the total rice consumption, 25 per cent of the total barley consumption.

But it must be remembered that the feeds to cattle, swine, and poultry are recovered in human food, only to a very slight extent, and horse feed is not so recovered at all. From the standpoint of our national food supply we ought to compare the 11,000,000 loaves wasted in alcoholic beverages with the total human food values involved. So measured, the waste of 11,000,000 loaves a day is very appreciable.

A pound loaf of bread contains about 1,250 calories or about half of the average per capita food requirement. Eleven million loaves, therefore, contain calories equal to the total calories required by 5,500,000 people.

Counting our population as 100,000,000, an amount equal at least to 5½ per cent of our entire national human food consumption is wasted in alcoholic beverages.

In terms of total breadstuffs the percentage is still greater. The consumption of bread in the United States, including pastry, is estimated by experts at five-sixths of a loaf per day per capita.

This means that what we waste in beer and spirits is 13 per cent of the total breadstuffs we eat.

WHAT 11,000,000 LOAVES A DAY MEAN IN WAR.

When we turn to the real problem, the war problem, the problem of supplying our allies, the 11,000,000 loaves per day, which means 80,000,000 bushels of grain per year, wasted in the production of alcoholic beverages, is 20 per cent of the total food and feed stuffs exported by the United States in 1916, that total being 405,000,000 bushels, made up as follows:

Food and feed stuffs exported from United States in 1916.

	Bushels.
Barley	22,485,920
Corn	53,543,227
Oats	101,411,239
Oatmeal (also large export of oat breakfast cereals)	1,750,000
Rice	1,330,000
Rye	15,161,090
Rye flour (bushels of rye to make)	500,000
Wheat	154,049,686
Wheat flour (bushels of wheat to make, 4½ bushels to barrel)	54,705,500
Wheat made into bread (estimated from pounds of breadstuffs)	210,000
Total	405,146,662

Again, 11,000,000 loaves a day is enough to supply the bread needs of the English (3,000,000), French (5,300,000), and Italian (3,400,000) Armies, counting the bread ration at a little less than 1 pound per day per soldier. It is much more than enough to supply the entire bread relief of Belgium.

This bread waste would more than supply a bread ration of 1 pound a loaf a day to all the inhabitants of Scotland and Ireland.

It would nearly supply one-third of the bread ration of England and Wales.

It would more than supply a pound loaf to every one of the 39,600,000 inhabitants of France every four days.

It would furnish half a pound a day to the 1,250,000 dependent children in Belgium, and a pound loaf to every man of the 240,000 in the United States Army, Regulars; the 400,000 National Guards; the 500,000 draft; the 5,300,000 in the French Army; the 3,000,000 in the British Army; and then give a loaf to every one of the million families in New York City.

It is true that we could make these same savings out of our large grain crop in some other way. Instead of stopping or reducing beer and whisky making, we could reduce exports to our allies or reduce the production of milk or meat or reduce the number of horses.

But, seriously and solemnly, are these the places at which to economize, rather than economizing on a use which is not only unnecessary but, as we all know, vastly injurious to the Nation?

DOES LIQUOR MAKING REDUCE THE PRICE OF MILK?

We may pause here to answer an ingenious objection.

The liquor interests in a circular to Congress (signed by the "Farmers' Feed Co.," New York) state that "to eliminate brewers' grains for milch cattle food will unquestionably lessen milk production 20 per cent; will unquestionably increase the cost of production to such an extent that the purchase price of a quart of milk now fixed at 11 cents per quart will unquestionably force the price to 25 or 30 cents per quart in all great centers of population where a pure-milk supply is most required."

These bogies need not frighten us, inasmuch as, in the first place, the Department of Agriculture has shown how to secure leguminous foods in substitution, and, in the second place, the brewers' grains could not possibly supply 20 per cent, or even one-third of that figure, of the grain food of milch cattle, or even a far smaller percentage of their total food.

According to a table in the Agricultural Outlook, October 15, 1914, Farmers' Bulletin 629, about 9 per cent of the corn crop, 5 per cent of the oat crop, and 4 per cent of the barley crop are used for feeding milch cows. These percentages, applied to the production of 1916, would indicate that from these three grains alone, without counting other cattle feeds, the milch cattle obtained 300,000,000 bushels of grain. The entire amount of brewers' grains in that year would, according to the brewers' own claims, not exceed 25,000,000 bushels, or 8 per cent of 300,000,000.

The price of milk may indeed rise from general war conditions, but the withdrawal of brewers' grains will not be the cause.

One of the chief dairy companies in the United States, when asked this question by our committee, replied:

"Probably the single factor of withdrawing brewers' grains from the market would not affect the price of milk or have any material influence on the price of other cattle feeds."

Prohibition would tend greatly to lower the cost of living, including the cost of milk, in many different ways, some direct and others, quite as important, indirect. Some of these will be shown in a later statement on national efficiency in relation to alcohol.

Incidentally, however, we may note that, as we all know, alcoholic beverages now waste both the money and the power to earn money of the poor. Dr. Haven Emerson, health commissioner of New York City, finds in a recent investigation that 5 per cent of the income of the poor in New York City is spent on alcoholic beverages. A much larger per cent of earning power is lost thereby. Consequently out of that saving in both these respects which war-time prohibition would bring there would be a large net gain for the babies' milk (about which the brewers and distillers are suddenly so solicitous) even if the price of milk should rise several fold.

The economy in buying brewers and distillers' grains, as compared with other foods, some of which have a great food value per ton, has also been exaggerated. The prices per ton on May 18, 1917, were as follows:

Spring bran	42.60
Brewers' grains	43.50
Malt sprouts	45.60
Choice yellow gluten	48.60
Winter wheat middlings	50.10
Oil meal	53.10
Distillers' dried grains	53.10
Corn and oats	61.75

Brewers and distillers' grains are not regarded as the best cattle feed. They need to be supplemented by other foods, such as miller's grains, and are not used at all by many of the best dairies. This fact is vouched for by one of the best known of these dairies in a letter to this committee.

GRAIN NOT THE ONLY FOOD WASTED.

Besides the grain used in manufacturing alcoholic beverages, there is an enormous quantity of molasses and considerable quantities of grape sugar or maltose as well as glucose or sirup so used.

Reduced to pounds the items for 1916 are as follows:

	Pounds.
Barley, 56,513,235 bushels, 48 pounds per bushel	2,712,635,280
Corn, 45,643,063 bushels, 56 pounds per bushel	2,556,011,528
Rye, 3,116,612 bushels, 56 pounds per bushel	174,530,272
Rice	141,249,292
Grape sugar or maltose	54,934,621
Molasses, 152,142,232 gallons, 11 pounds per gallon	1,673,564,552
Glucose or sirup, 2,742,894 gallons, 11 pounds per gallon	30,171,394
Total	7,343,096,939

These figures include some two-thirds of a billion pounds of grain used in the manufacture of industrial alcohol. The figures have been carefully compiled by Prof. T. M. Carver, of Harvard University, with others, and reviewed by Prof. Cannon, physiologist, of the Harvard Medical School, and others.

It has been objected that a large amount of the molasses is not fit for human consumption. A large amount of it, however, is so used, namely, that from the cane-sugar refineries; this is being used in the present sugar shortage, particularly in England and France. That from beet-sugar refineries is not good for human consumption; but it is good for stock feed, and can also be used for the manufacture of industrial alcohol. In short, all of the seven and one-third billion pounds could be utilized otherwise than by manufacture into alcoholic beverages and almost all of it could be used for human food. Probably the total food value wasted when the items other than grains are included is a quarter larger than that of the 11,000,000 loaves.

FOOD WASTE IN THE LIGHT OF WORLD FAMINE.

This food waste would be considered important in ordinary times, but in time of war, when there is a great food shortage, the waste is much more serious. The extent of this shortage is not yet realized, although Mr. Hoover has published his findings. These findings are based on studies made by him and his staff in the various countries abroad in collaboration with the food ministers of the various countries. The requirements of bread grains for our allies were calculated by him as follows:

	Bread grains.	Fodder grains.
	Bushels.	Bushels.
United Kingdom	225,000,000	170,000,000
France	175,000,000	70,000,000
Italy	90,000,000	60,000,000
Belgium and Portugal	50,000,000	.....
European neutrals	10,000,000	.....
Ex-European neutrals	5,000,000	116,000,000
Total	555,000,000	416,000,000

This makes a total grain requirement of nearly a billion bushels, of which over half is for human consumption. Mr. Hoover thinks that, while it would be impossible for the United States to supply all of the requirement for grain food for humans and grain fodder for animals, the major part of the burden must fall on us.

Certainly, all of the grain we now waste in drink will be needed and more, for, with 20,000,000 men withdrawn from production, with grain fields devastated in France, Belgium, Poland, and Serbia, with grain ships destroyed by submarines, and with short crops at home (the shortage in winter wheat having been estimated by our Department of Agriculture at 189,000,000 bushels), we need food economy as we have never needed it in this country since the Pilgrim Fathers suffered in those historic days, the survival of which led to the establishment of Thanksgiving Day.

The International Bureau of Agriculture at Rome has estimated the shortage of the crops of 1916, as compared with 1915, as follows:

1916 shortage relatively to 1915.	Per cent.
Wheat, 17 leading countries	25.3
Rye, 11 countries	6
Barley, 16 countries	8.6
Oats, 14 countries	13.6
Corn, 6 countries	14.6
Potatoes, 7 countries	13.6

The chief reason why we in America have not yet appreciated the shortage of our food supply is that, so far, we have eked it out by drawing on reserves. We have been slaughtering animals and reducing their number, and have drawn on foods in cold storage so greatly that the decreases in a year up to March 1, last, are as follows:

	Per cent.
Cheese (American—pounds)	29.3
Eggs (cases—30 dozen)	86.3
Lard (pounds)	31.7
Lamb and mutton (pounds)	31.1
Frozen pork (pounds)	36.9

The foregoing table is one of many of great interest on this subject given by Profs. Seager and Chaddock in "Columbia War Papers," series 1, No. 6, Division of Intelligence and Publicity of Columbia University, 1917.

The important point is that the shortage is growing greater every day. The need in 1917 will be far more than was that in 1916, and that of 1918 and 1919, if the war continues, will be still greater.

In England the food pinch has already become so acute that in May the King issued a proclamation exhorting the people to lessen their consumption of bread by at least one-fourth.

The London Spectator has affirmed that if England had adopted war-time prohibition when Russia did there would now be no peril as a result of the submarine blockade.

We shall do well to exercise foresight and act before we have reached real disaster.

Even if the food saving through war-time prohibition were much less than it actually is, such saving ought to be effected. To plead that the economy is a small one is not only a false contention but a wrong kind of contention. It is not the spirit of war economy to permit a waste on the ground that it is not large. In war we need our full strength and should make every economy, large or small, to get it.

In short, not only is the food economy from war-time prohibition a large economy but it is, large or small, a proper war measure—almost a necessary one. As Mr. Hoover has said, if we can not feed our allies they can not fight and we shall have to fight alone.

As soon as the people of this country realize this fact and that world war is threatening world famine no patriotic citizen, whatever his views on other aspects of the alcohol problem, will hesitate to favor war-time prohibition.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota whether he will permit me to bring up the question of a conference report? There will be no debate on it.

Mr. STERLING. I shall have to decline to yield for that purpose, I will say to the Senator from Nevada. I regret not to yield, but my time is limited, Mr. President; and I should like to finish before 2 o'clock. I think I shall easily be able to do so.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the committee as a substitute to section 12 of the House bill, and wish to go on record as in favor of section 12 as it passed the House.

Of course, I have due regard for the overwhelming sentiment in my own State which at the last election declared in favor of state-wide prohibition. In my vote here I shall give expression to that sentiment; but it is also my own sentiment. I have sought to view the question from every standpoint material or relevant to the issue. That issue stated in briefest terms is whether in this time of war food or feed materials shall be used in the production of alcohol for beverage purposes.

We call this a food-control bill. The object of the bill in one word is "efficiency." National efficiency. Efficiency in the Army, in the Navy, in the general citizenship of the country. Efficiency that we may not at any point fail in our support of our allies, and that we may be the great and determining factor we are capable of being in this war against autocracy and in behalf of liberty and humanity.

Hence, we seek through legislation to increase and conserve the food supply in order that the men of the Army and of the Navy may be well fed; in order that we may help make up for the shortage of the last two years and render our allies—England and France, especially—even greater service than we have in the past in the food and feed cereals we shall furnish them.

According to Mr. Hoover, the total needs of all our allies from outside sources will approximate 800,000,000 to 1,000,000,000 bushels, of which vast aggregate there will be needed 500,000,000 bushels of wheat and 250,000,000 to 350,000,000 bushels of other cereals such as corn, barley, rye, and oats. Our exports of all cereals have heretofore amounted to from 400,000,000 to 425,000,000. If Canada should have a surplus of 200,000,000; if the rest of the world is able to contribute 200,000,000 more, there will still be a shortage unless we increase our production or make available for food and feed much more than we have in the past.

What then can be more just and reasonable than that we should take that action here which will divert the many million bushels of grain from accustomed use for beverage purposes to the higher and more urgent use for food purposes?

To show the need of one of our great allies now and the strict regulations made necessary there by a scant supply of essential foodstuffs, I read from yesterday's Evening Star under the title:

Allies conserving their food supply—Even the Englishman is going hungry, according to American writer.

The article proceeds as follows:

Americans who are asked to conserve food to help feed the allies may inquire, "What are the allies doing to help themselves?"

"Much more than is being asked of America as yet," is the reply of an American writer and political economist, just back from England, who says he went hungry over there, in common with Englishmen, who are doing their utmost to practice food economy.

"I simply could not get enough at any hotel or restaurant to satisfy me," he stated. "This is the common report of others who have studied the food conditions abroad.

REGULATIONS EXACTING.

"The regulations of the ministry of food controlling the serving of meals in public eating places are exact and detailed, and they are being enforced," he stated. "One can not have more than 5 ounces of meat at any meal, and this means 5 ounces of meat in the kitchen as it comes from the butcher. When it comes to the table as edible meat it is half that weight. Nor can one have more than 2 ounces of bread, which bread must be at least 12 hours old, or more than two-sevenths of an ounce of sugar at any meal. The London bakers are making rolls of 1 ounce and 2 ounces each. They are simply miniatures.

"The regulation against waste is drastic. No bread may be thrown away. A piece of bread was found in an ash can by the police. The household was fined 20 shillings. One hundred and fifty pounds of stale cake were found thrown out behind a restaurant. The proprietor was fined £20 ($100).

PASTRIES CAN NOT BE MADE.

"No light pastries, muffins, crumpets, or fancy tea cakes may be made. No currant or milk bread may be made, nor any sugar be used in making any bread. Many similar restrictions exist and are enforced.

"In addition to the governmental regulations the food controller carries on continuously a strong propaganda for voluntary rationing, cutting out of waste, and food saving generally in the home. All households are asked to limit their consumption of bread to 4 pounds a week per person, of meat to 2½ pounds, and sugar three-quarters of a pound. Those families which agree to do this put up in a window, facing the street so that all may see, a conspicuous card bearing the legend: 'In honor bound we adopt the national scale of voluntary rations.'

"This pledge of voluntary restriction has been widely accepted. In the little town of Church Stretton, containing 253 houses, the card is displayed in 225. And there are other records nearly as good. In some towns the average ration per person has been reduced to an amount below that asked for by the Government."

Such, Mr. President, are the conditions in England; such the measures taken by the Government to meet them, and the cooperation of the people in them. They serve to emphasize our duty to do all we can to aid them by furnishing increased food supplies.

But we must not forget the obligation to our own people. The public tranquillity necessary to insure the successful prosecution of this war depends on an ample food supply at reasonable prices to the masses—to the millions of manual workers throughout the land.

Mr. President, a bread riot is worse and more to be dreaded than a beer riot. And there never will be a beer riot in this country unless it is inspired by too much beer.

Reference was made yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] to the disgraceful affair at East St. Louis, in the great State of Illinois. I can not say with absolute certainty, Mr. President, but I almost feel warranted in making the statement that had it not been for the intoxicating liquors in that community there would have been no such disgraceful riot in East St. Louis.

Our situation, Mr. President, in regard to the use of beer and wine as beverages by our laboring classes is different from that of European countries. We are cosmopolitan in the employment of labor. No one drink, as beer in Germany or England, has been the traditional drink for generations of Slav and Slovak, of Polak, Italian, Hungarian, and Greek; and the deprivation caused by prohibiting the manufacture of any one or more than one intoxicant will not be universal, as would be that caused by prohibiting beer in England or Germany, or possibly wine in France. Our problem, therefore, is in this respect an easier one than that which has confronted Lloyd-George or Bonar Law.

To the people of all these various nationalities, represented as they are in our mines, factories, and on our railroads, we shall say, "For the cause of freedom, for the opportunities for which you have sought these shores, in the interests of the public weal and of your own wives and little ones, be prepared to do your 'bit' in the way of self-denial and sacrifice and prove yourselves worthy citizens of that country which now in this great war again proves itself the friend of the oppressed of all nations."

Mr. President, I have no fears that any disturbance will result from the enactment and enforcement of section 12 substantially as it came from the House. Twenty-five States, I think—more than half of the States of the Union—have adopted State-wide prohibition. There has been no rioting, no social upheaval in any of them. On the contrary, business has prospered, labor has been better fed and clothed, and crime has diminished. From the economic standpoint there can be hardly a greater boon to the race than the abolition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

What are the essentials of that man power, which in the last analysis is the one thing we are now trying to conserve? It has, first, the physical basis, the sound body, the bodily vigor of men; second, the intellectual basis, the sound, alert, and active mind in the sound body; third, the moral basis, the sense of duty and moral obligation.

It is brawn, then, and brain, and moral fiber which are the essential elements of man power—of man power on the farm, in the mine, in the factory, in every industry or enterprise which engages the thoughts and activities of men—of man power in command in the field, or in the ranks, in the charge, or in the trenches. Intoxicating liquors, instead of conserving or building up, tear down and destroy these necessary elements of man power, all of which are needed in these momentous times. I trust, Mr. President, that, in the interests of our national security and national defense, the Senate may vote its approval of section 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. As many as are in favor of the amendment will say "aye"——

Mr. CURTIS. What is the committee amendment?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, is this the amendment proposed by the committee to section 12?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the committee amendment which has been under consideration for some hours.

Mr. STERLING. I beg pardon.

Mr. REED. Let it be stated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 12, after the word "employees," the committee proposes to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That whenever any person or persons entitled to receive such wages are dissatisfied with the rate of wages so fixed by the President, he or they shall have the right to have the reasonableness of such wages reviewed and determined by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, created by the act approved July 15, 1913; and in case said board shall conclude that a higher rate of wages shall be allowed their findings shall be conclusive in the premises, and said board shall prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this proviso into effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senate of the United States is about to decide the important question of whether or not during the period of this war this Government shall permit the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of alcoholic liquors. It is a question which most vitally affects the welfare of our Nation. It is both an economic and a moral question.

In speaking of alcoholic liquors I include beer and wine as well as whisky, rum, gin, or any intoxicating liquors containing a high percentage of alcohol.

From the standpoint of a prohibitionist this question is indivisible. To prohibit one or a few of these varieties and not include all means an absolute failure so far as it affects prohibition. Any alcoholic liquor used as a beverage and which contains more than one-half of 1 per cent comes under our revenue laws and is taxed. Any legislation which merely limits or even prohibits the manufacture and use of one and not all alcoholic liquors is a sham and a fraud.

Now, as to the economic phase of the question: According to a statement issued by Irving Fisher, professor of political economy at Yale University, he estimates that $2,225,000,000 is paid by the consumer for alcoholic liquors in a single year. The Government received during the year 1916 from revenue taxes on alcoholic beverages $159,000,000 from distilled spirits and $89,000,000 from fermented liquors, making considerably less than one-quarter of a billion altogether. But the consumer ultimately pays this tax, and in addition to this amount more than $2,000,000,000, which the Government does not get and which is far worse than wasted for the Nation.

If I had the time I could show to the Senate that in every "bone-dry" State by the eradication of the saloon taxes as well as crimes have decreased. So the argument used by the liquor people that we can not dispense with the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors because we need the revenue is no argument at all, but mere buncombe.

If the public is taxed a quarter of a billion dollars to permit the manufacturer and the dramseller to engage in the business, which is injurious to public health and public morals, why would it not be better to stop this traffic in the United States when one-half of the States of the Union have already enacted laws forbidding the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors?

Now, let us consider the moral side of prohibition. This is the most important of all questions. This Congress has just passed a bill prohibiting the use of intoxicating liquors in military camps. The President of the United States approved this provision, and it is now a law. If beer and wine are so essential to public welfare, as is claimed by the friends of the saloon and the liquor traffic, why did we think it necessary to prohibit the sale or the use of it in military camps?

Senators, you can not defend the position of partial prohibition. No man with convictions against the liquor traffic can maintain his position as a friend of prohibition who permits the manufacture, sale, or use of any of these intoxicating liquors. With only beer and wine the American saloon will exist, and the American soloon barroom will continue to administer this poison which has been condemned by the American Medical Association as injurious to public health and public welfare.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of section 12 of the bill. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, it is proposed to strike out section 12 and to insert the following:

SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the manufacture of distilled spirits for beverage purposes.

(b) Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such liquors is essential, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food or feed, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall nave been given, and shall remain unrevoked, no person shall, after a reasonable time, which shall be prescribed in such notice, use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of such vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, except in accordance with the limitations, regulations, and prohibitions prescribed in such notice, or to produce any such liquors having an alcoholic content in excess of the amount prescribed therefor in such notice. When the question arises as to whether any particular product is suitable for food or feed, the question shall be determined by the President, and his determination shall be conclusive for the purposes of this section.

(c) Except as otherwise herein provided, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be charged with the administration of this section, and he is authorized, with the approval of the President, to require the taking out of such permits, the keeping of such records, the execution of such bonds, and the observance of such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the execution of the same.

(d) Any person who willfully violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punisned by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I might just as well take my 10 minutes now.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope the parliamentary inquiry will not be taken out of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will not be.

Mr. NORRIS. I will withdraw it if it is going to be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will not be. The Chair rules that the parliamentary situation should be settled.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it ought to be cleared up, and that is the reason I make the inquiry now, as much for the benefit of the Senator from North Dakota as anyone else.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. This unanimous-consent agreement says:

No Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the section as a whole, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment that may be pending.

The question is this, Mr. President: Will the Chair hold that while an amendment is pending a Senator is entitled to his 10 minutes on the section as a whole, or will it be only when no amendment is pending that a Senator will be allowed to talk 10 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold, in accordance with the ruling of the Vice President on a previous occasion, that when an amendment to the amendment is pending the 5-minute rule will prevail; that it is only when the original amendment is being considered that the 10-minute rule will prevail.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is true, Mr. President, after we have voted on this amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon there will be no longer any opportunity to talk 10 minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When there is an amendment pending to either of the propositions, a Senator getting the floor may discuss the amendment; but if the Senator who gets the floor offers an amendment to perfect either amendment, he will be held to five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but will that apply to others than the Senator offering the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will, as long as there is an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to have it made clear to begin with. I am not particular what the ruling is, just so we understand when a Senator must use his 10 minutes, if at all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina will state it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The parliamentary inquiry is this: Under this agreement will the Chair rule that a Senator speaking to the bill in whatever time he sees fit, may speak 10 minutes, but when he addresses himself to an amendment he may speak only 5 minutes? Has he or has he not the right to speak 10 minutes on the bill and 5 minutes on any amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule, in accordance with the ruling by the Vice President under a similar unanimous-consent agreement, that when an amendment to perfect either question is pending the 5-minute rule will obtain. If any Senator gets the floor when there is no amendment to either question pending, he may take 10 minutes on either question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to know what the situation is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas addressed the Chair first and is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I correctly understand the ruling of the Chair, the 5-minute rule is now in order.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, I make the point of order that the 5-minute rule is now in order, and upon that I wish to be heard just briefly. I understand, of course, that it is not to come out of the time of the Senator from North Dakota.

The language of the unanimous-consent agreement is:

That during the consideration of the said section no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the section as a whole, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered thereto; that the amendment proposed by the committee, with such amendments as may be offered to it, shall be first considered.

The effect of this unanimous-consent agreement is to make the amendment of the Senator from Oregon the pending question, and that is the pending question; and so long as an amendment is pending the 5-minute rule applies.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me finish this statement, please. Now, section 12 can not be the pending question. The parliamentary situation is this: The committee first reported that section with a large number of amendments. Those amendments would have been the pending question but for the unanimous-consent agreement, which displaces the first report of the committee and makes the amendment of the Senator from Oregon the pending question. The rule provides that as long as an amendment is pending, or an amendment to that amendment, the 5-minute rule shall apply. When the amendments have been disposed of and the section has been perfected, then, and not until then, under the plan, the literal language of the unanimous-consent agreement, does the 10-minute rule apply.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the rule as I understand it, the order of amendment is reversed. Under the old rule, the perfecting of the House provision would have been first in order. Now, after the committee amendment is voted upon, whether the substitute offered by the Senator from Arkansas is agreed to or the committee amendment, will we have the opportunity to vote as between the amendment and the original House provision, and then may we perfect the House provision before the vote is taken?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands it, the pending amendment is the committee amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon. That is the pending question. If a substitute is offered—it has not yet been offered—if a substitute is offered, which is a motion to strike out and insert, that will be another question, and either the pending question or the substitute may be perfected before the vote is taken on the substitute. All of that will be under the five-minute rule. After the Chamberlain amendment has held the boards against all substitutes, then that will be the question, as amending the section. Not until that is disposed of, and the section comes up for passage, will the 10-minute rule apply.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. But the point I wanted to get at is this: When will we have the opportunity to perfect the House provision?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done after the Chamberlain amendment is disposed of, one way or the other.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. THOMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I understand it, the motion of the Senator from Oregon is to strike out and insert—to strike out the section, and to insert the amendment proposed by the committee. That leaves the amendment proposed by the committee, under our rules, open to amendment. It has to be dealt with first under the unanimous-consent agreement, as I apprehend, which sets aside the rule which gives priority to the original clause; but I take it that the original clause can be perfected after we have perfected the amendment. Am I right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MYERS and Mr. GRONNA addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. MYERS. Well, I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana will state his point of order.

Mr. MYERS. The point of order will not come out of the Senator's time. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said that the Chamberlain amendment is the pending question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. MYERS. I make the point of order that my amendment, which I offered yesterday to the Chamberlain amendment, is the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no amendment offered yesterday, if the Senator will pardon the Chair. It was merely proposed, and is now lying on the table, and may be called up when the Senator gets the floor for that purpose; but it is not pending.

Mr. MYERS. Can I call it up now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Senator has not the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment. He has the floor for the purpose of stating a point of order.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not understand that the Chair has yet rendered his decision. Are we entitled to 10 minutes while the proposed committee amendment is pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled that the five-minute rule is in order until the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon is disposed of.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not understand the answer made to an inquiry. Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon a substitute for section 12 of the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; to strike out and insert a substitute.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is it not in order to perfect the House provision before a vote is taken upon the substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would have been but for the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, Mr. President, I want to say that I am satisfied that there were very few Senators here who understood the unanimous-consent agreement as suspending all the rules of the Senate. The unanimous-consent agreement may have been worded in order to bring about a situation like this, but it was not understood by those who gave their consent to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not a party to any negotiations. He is merely construing the agreement.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Before I can state it, I desire to call the Chair's attention to the fact that the committee amendment is the one now contained in the bill. I can not understand how a substitute offered by the committee could take precedence over the amendments as previously reported by the committee in section 12.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Because the unanimous-consent agreement distinctly states that it shall.

Mr. THOMPSON. No; I beg the Chair's pardon. It states, if the Chair will read it, that the amendment proposed by the committee shall be first considered, and I construe that to be the committee amendment now in the bill, and not the Chamberlain amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the amendment proposed by the committee is the one offered by the Senator from Oregon now; not the one printed in the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is the amendment that is offered as a substitute, as I understand it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. THOMPSON. All that I am interested in is this: On the assurance of the Chair that we can have a vote on the original House provision somewhere along the line, I do not care where it takes place; but I should like to have a vote as between the House provision and the original Senate committee amendment and then the substitute as finally offered. I do not understand, as a parliamentary proposition, that a substitute offered by a committee has any greater force than a substitute offered by an individual Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not. The Senator is right about that.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. STONE. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and I should like to have the roll called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McLean	Sherman
Bankhead	Hale	McNary	Shields
Beckham	Hitchcock	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Hollis	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Husting	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	James	New	Smoot
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	Newlands	Sterling
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Stone
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thomas
Culberson	Kellogg	Penrose	Thompson
Cummins	Kendrick	Phelan	Tillman
Curtis	Kenyon	Poindexter	Townsend
Dillingham	Knox	Pomerene	Trammell
Fernald	La Follette	Ransdell	Underwood
Fletcher	Lewis	Reed	Wadsworth
France	Lodge	Robinson	Warren
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Shafroth	Watson
Gerry	McKellar	Sheppard	Wolcott

Mr. ROBINSON. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a minute?

Mr. GRONNA. I can not yield now, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMPSON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. On June 11, 1917, the American Medical Association passed resolutions condemning alcoholic beverages and stated: "We are justified in saying that the Nation loses two billions worth of energy in their production." Under prohibition the same two and a quarter billions would be spent on nonalcoholic drinks and on other things necessary and beneficial to the human race.

We have an opportunity to-day to make this Nation "bone dry," and let us do it. Let us take from the young boy and the young girl the temptation of frequenting the dramshops. Let us raise this tax in a manner which will not reduce the efficiency or corrupt the morals of American humanity. And those of you who fear riots should remember that it is far more dangerous to have bread riots without bread than beer riots without beer.

Mr. President, I am exceedingly sorry to find myself in opposition to the President of the United States. I am not opposed to any legislation that will give the Chief Executive of this Nation, especially in these days of peril, all the authority necessary to enable him to command and mobilize every industry in this land, in order to win for this Nation a glorious victory and a lasting and durable peace. But I am confident that the President is mistaken in his opinion that it is necessary in order to collect revenue to continue the manufacture of brandies, beer, and wine. I am also convinced that it is a mistaken idea to assume that there would be any dissatisfaction among the people of this country to prohibit the use of alcoholic beverages, when we know that every ounce of foodstuff will be needed to feed the American people and the allies of Europe.

Sir, I have the conviction—and in the words of the Apostle Paul, when appearing before the governors and King Agrippa, he said—

> And herein do I exercise myself to have always a conscience void of offense toward God and toward men.

Therefore I can not follow the President of the United States but must follow my own conscience, because I know that the elimination of alcoholic beverages from the human race will add to their efficiency. I know that it will benefit their condition morally. I know from practical experience, living as I do in a State where for 30 years we have had prohibition, that from an economic standpoint the eradication of the saloon and the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors is one of the great factors for economic prosperity, for intellectual, social, and moral advancement. In taking this position I voice not only my own conviction but the sentiments of the people of my State and, I believe, a majority of the people of the United States.

About one-half of our country is to-day "bone dry." We all admit that in order to supply the allies of Europe our supply of cereals, especially wheat, is insufficient and short. As a partial remedy for this a majority of the people of the United States believe that instead of taking these important food products and converting them into alcoholic beverages we should conserve them and manufacture them into bread.

A majority of the Members of the House seemed to recognize the wishes of the people of the country, and they provided for a "bone-dry" provision in this food bill. A majority of this body was in favor of this provision, but a few days ago our hopes were shattered by the announcement from the White House that the President of the United States is opposed to the prohibition of beer and wine.

Mr. President, I am sorry that the Chief Executive of this Nation has taken such a step. I know that he is woefully mistaken, both from an economic and an ethical standpoint. This is a question which in times of peace has been advocated by millions of our people. It is a question which will be agitated and discussed until it has been justly solved. It will not do to say that the demand for prohibition will cease because the President of the United States has seen fit to enter his protest against this legislation. Those of you who are sincere in the belief that prohibition is for the best interests of this country, both from an economic and moral standpoint, have no right to surrender your views to any man, not even the President of the United States.

Is there anybody who dares to question the advantage and the necessity of a sober people during war as well as in times of peace? There is not a Member of this body who can successfully contradict the statement that the revenue derived from the liquor traffic is a most expensive system of collecting the revenue for our Government. There is not a Member of this body who can successfully deny that in prohibition States taxation has been decreased and wages have increased to the laboring man. And as wages have increased the efficiency of labor has increased to the advantage of the employer. Social conditions have improved for the betterment of the individual, the family, and society. Conditions in prohibition States have changed, not for the worse, as is always stated by the friends of the liquor traffic; not with dissatisfaction to the laborer or the employer; it has not increased taxation; it has not resulted in riots among any class of men, but it has improved conditions of men in all businesses and in all walks of life. Institutions of learning for the enlightenment of man have been substituted for the bawdy house and the saloon. Men and women have improved their condition financially, physically, intellectually, and morally. So, why should we abandon our position because the Chief Executive of this Nation is opposed to it?

I remember well when the Webb-Kenyon bill was vetoed by President Taft. When that veto came back to Congress we met his objection with a determination to follow our own consciences, and we refused to sustain his veto. Not a single Member who belonged to the party with which I am affiliated changed his position. We voted to override his veto, and, although President Taft said in that veto that he believed it was unconstitutional, the Supreme Court of the United States has since upheld that law, and it is in full force and effect to-day.

Now, so far as I am personally concerned, I care not whether it is a Republican President or a Democratic President on questions as important as this is, affecting every citizen of our land not only from an economic standpoint, but from the standpoint of morality, I shall refuse to follow him.

I refuse to follow President Wilson because I know that so far as the revenue is concerned it is an economic waste for the Government to continue the license system and to continue to collect revenue for the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors.

I have during my business career employed thousands of men. I know from the practical standpoint that the services of a sober man are infinitely more valuable than the services of a drunk or even the services of a man who even drinks moderately. That fact is being recognized by the large as well as by the small business man and employer all over this land.

I am not qualified to speak from a military standpoint, but I do not believe that it is true that the efficiency of a soldier is increased by feeding him intoxicating liquors. I believe that in war as well as in peace the services of the sober man are far superior to those of the man who uses alcoholic drinks.

I am sorry that our President failed to realize this great opportunity to show his appreciation of the efforts made by the millions of mothers of men and women in this country to do away with the liquor traffic at least during the war.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed, in connection with my remarks, part of a speech delivered by the immortal Abraham Lincoln at a meeting of a temperance society on February 22, 1842.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXTRACTS FROM AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE SPRINGFIELD WASHINGTONIAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, FEBRUARY 22, 1842, BY ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Turn now to the temperance revolution. In it we shall find a stronger bondage broken, a viler slavery manumitted, a greater tyrant deposed; in it, more of want supplied, more disease healed, more sorrow assuaged. By it no orphans starving, no widows weeping; by it none wounded in feeling, none injured in interest; even the dram maker and dramseller will have glided into other occupations so gradually as never to have felt the change, and will stand ready to join all others in the universal song of gladness. And what a noble ally this to the cause of political freedom; with such an aid its march can not fail to be on and on, till every son of earth shall drink in rich fruition the sorrow-quenching drafts of perfect liberty. Happy day when—all appetities controlled, all poisons subdued, all matter subjected—mind, all conquering mind, shall live and move, the monarch of the world. Glorious consummation! Hail, fall of fury! Reign of reason, all hail!

Mr. GRONNA. I have before me a statement printed by the board of temperance, prohibition, and public morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, under date of June 28, 1917, entitled "Let the churches buy a bone-dry bond issue to replace liquor revenue," which reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 28, 1917.

LET THE CHURCHES BUY A BONE-DRY BOND ISSUE TO REPLACE LIQUOR REVENUE.

In the event of national prohibition we pledge that the churches of the United States will buy $500,000,000 of liberty bonds annually during the period of the war, which will more than replace the revenue that might be derived from the liquor traffic.

A study of over a million recorded lives, based upon records made by expert investigators employed by insurance companies, shows that on an average, of those who reach 20 years of age, abstainers live to be 64 years old, moderate drinkers live 51 years, and hard drinkers are not accepted.

I also have a letter from the National Eclectic Medical Association, signed by H. H. Helbing, recording secretary, which I ask to have included in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

NATIONAL ECLECTIC MEDICAL ASSOCIATION,
St. Louis, Mo., June 25, 1917.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: As the recently elected secretary of the National Eclectic Medical Association, I beg your indulgence while I bring to your notice action taken at our meeting held in Nashville June 19–22, 1917. It was a resolution similar to that passed by the American Medical Association relating to the deleterious effects of alcoholic beverages upon the human system and calling for war prohibition.

We should have war prohibition so as to increase our efficiency in this crisis, the greatest in our history. There is, or will be, a shortage of labor; therefore brewery and distillery workers will be needed in the other trades and at the front.

The revenue song of the liquor traffic is as old as the Civil War and as foolish as the story of Baron Munchaussen. A moment's reason will convince any sane man that the food value of the grain wasted will pay all the liquor revenue and a billion dollars more, since it will feed 7,000,000 men per year.

Your constituents at home are becoming more and more convinced that it is a sensible thing to do during the war, and public sentiment is rapidly changing in favor of the absolute prohibition of the manufacture of alcoholic beverages, including wine and beer, during the war. I hope you will so view the question and give prohibition for the war your valuable vote.

Yours, very truly, H. H. HELBRING, Recording Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I also have a memorial signed by Leo F. Rettger, a professor at Yale University, and other members of the faculty of the university, and one from R. J. Caldwell Co., of New York, which I ask to have inserted in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Undersigned urge immediate legislation by which Congress shall itself prohibit use of any foodstuffs to make any intoxicating liquors, also preventing use of whisky on hand as a beverage. We believe American people will not approve legislation that spares either whisky, wine, or beer, or transfers responsibility to overburdened President.

NEW YORK, June 29, 1917.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I trust that beer will be included in the prohibition, for the manufacture of it consumes quite enough grain to constitute its suppression on economic grounds. If it is true that there are $500,000,000 revenue to the Government from the manufacture and sale of beer, which the Finance Committee of the Senate seems to fear the Government would lose and the people have to make up in some other way, by the suppression of the traffic in beer, I contend that this is a mistaken premise.

The amount of grain liberated for food purposes by the abolishment of the manufacture of beer would quite likely influence the price of grains for food purposes to a sufficient extent to make up to the public far more than the tax on beer, so if they did have to pay it in some other way they could do so with profit. Moreover the money they would save from not spending it on beer would very easily, in the aggregate, equal the present beer tax many times over.

The Government would be the gainer by, first, more efficient results from workmen; second, by releasing a large number of men from an unproductive industry to engage in a productive industry, which would mean much more to the Government than any other single item in the whole argument.

Faithfully, yours, R. J. CALDWELL.

Mr. GRONNA. I also ask leave to have printed as an appendix to my remarks certain telegrams which have been sent to me—I have only collected a few of them—and an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Quoted advertisement in Washington papers simply rehash. Familiar with liquor campaign. Falsehood everywhere exploded. Actual prohibition experience after 18 months, practically every former brewing interest, including largest, adopted other productions, increased pay rolls, better business, safer investments, vastly improved material prosperity, and moral welfare. No suggestions whatever to return to conditions permitting manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors.

From my observation prohibition greatly lessens drinking. All forms of intoxicants, also their attendant crimes and court records, indisputably sustain this. Breweries need not suffer loss if they will divert operations to making alcohol for fuel and industrial uses. It will be a national crime if we do not prohibit use of grains for making intoxicants.

Our business best in history. City's bank deposits and building permits show large increase. Jail inmates cut one-half. Saloon buildings now occupied by business that is a benefit. Most brewery buildings of State now used for other purposes. Pay rolls of State greatly increased; money formerly wasted for drink now goes for legitimate uses benefiting buyer and seller. Emphatically our experience proves prohibition a decided success.

COMMITTEE ON WAR-TIME PROHIBITION,
Care W. G. Calderwood, Executive Secretary,
Raleigh Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Seventeen months of permit-liquor system cut off three-fourths of use of whisky and beer in Washington. Total prohibition in force here for past two weeks has brought drunkenness and crime in Spokane to minimum. Nearly all former saloon rooms now occupied by useful business. Many former breweries in State now used for soft drink and canning factories. Wages are going up. Factories and farms calling in vain for workmen; banks hold 50 per cent more deposits than two years ago, and poorhouse has shrunk 50 per cent. No argument could coax people of Washington to return to saloon system.

W. G. CALDERWOOD,
Executive Secretary, Committee on War-Time Prohibition,
The Raleigh Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Replying your wire 21st saloons in this State closed January 1, 1916. Brewery properties practically without exception have been converted to other uses, notably manufacture fruit juice and dairy products. Permit system under which individuals can import limited quantities intoxicants at stated intervals has doubtless increased proportionate consumption hard liquors among certain classes. This permit system will discontinue July 1. Since saloons closed committments to prisons and county jails have decreased 50 per cent. Purchase larger quantities and better qualities of merchandise and pay more promptly.

There is no question but that people of the State of Washigton are better off in every respect morally, physically, and financially under prohibition than when saloons were in operation.

W. G. CALDERWOOD,
Executive Secretary, Committee on War-Time Prohibition,
Raleigh Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Answering your wire of yesterday, prohibition in our Western States has not driven men to drink whisky, brandy, or rum. On the contrary, it has proven the greatest blessing to the working class and everyone else. There has been a constant increase in wages and prosperity in business ever since Oregon and Washington went dry, and that was true before war conditions affected this western country. I suppose it is true that investments in breweries have very materially decreased although have not become worthless because all the large concerns I know of have been turned into manufacturing something else. Taxes have not increased because the increase in property has more than taken care of this item. As to pay rolls being cut off there has been a great deal more work in Oregon and Washington since they went dry than ever before. Instead of a decrease in pay rolls they have been very largely increased. Altogetner it is the best investment that these two States have ever made, and the sentiment in favor of it to-day is very much greater than when it was carried. Nearly everybody, even the drinking class, are in favor of prohibition because of the great benefit derived from it.

THE RESULTS OF TURNING FRUITS INTO WINE AND BRANDY.

[Prepared by Scientific Temperance Federation, of Boston, Miss Cora F. Stoddard, executive secretary.]

The proposal to leave the way open for the continued manufacture and sale of wines and distilled liquors from fruits is a proposal to open a Pandora's box of troubles from which the United States has been relatively free.

The total consumption of wines in the United States in 1850 was 6,316,371 gallons. In 1915 it was 32,911,909 gallons. But while the total consumption had increased fivefold, the per capita consumption in 1915 was but 0.32 gallon as against 0.27 gallon in 1850. The highest per capita consumption of wine was 0.67 gallon in 1909 and 1911. These figures show that up to now wine has constituted a relatively small part of our alcohol consumption, less than 3 per cent at the most.

The increase which has taken place in the total amount consumed is an increase in the use of domestic wines. The consumption of imported wines has remained fairly constant through all these years (6,095,000 gallons in 1850, 5,656,219 gallons in 1915), never rising above 10,000,000 gallons or falling below 3,000,000 gallons.

But the total consumption of domestic wines increased from 221,249 gallons in 1850, to a maximum of 9,863,735 gallons in 1915. (United States Statistical Abstract, 1915, p. 514.)

This indicates in a measure the development of the wine-producing industry which began in Ohio shortly after 1850, and in the sixties was given a strong foothold in California, which is now the largest wine-producing section of the United States.

The emphasis laid by the wine producers upon what they call "light wines," which they urge as desirable "hygienic drinks" likely to promote "temperance," has obscured the fact that along with the development of the wine industry there has been an increased consumption of spirits made from fruits. The consumption of these fruit spirits (brandy, etc.) has increased from 1,223,830 gallons in 1870 to 2,516,054 gallons in 1915; that is, has practically doubled. (United States Statistical Abstract, 1915, p. 514.) This means that the development of wine production is accompanied by production of a form of spirits, brandy, which averages 45 per cent alcoholic strength—stronger in alcohol than the average whisky. (Report committee of 50, Physiological Aspects of Liquor Problem, vol. 2, p. 339.)

Furthermore, the wines themselves are by no means all "light wines." The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue (1916, p. 17) shows that normally nearly 5,000,000 gallons of brandy are used in fortifying wines; that is, in increasing their alcoholic strength above the 10–13 per cent of alcohol obtainable by fermentation. These fortified wines may contain from 15 to as much as 24 per cent of alcohol. That this is no small item to be considered appears in the fact that in 1915, an average year, there were 4,852,848 gallons of brandy used in fortifying 15,646,086 gallons of wine, resulting in 18,580,373 gallons of this stronger wine. (Report committee internal revenue, 1916, p. 117.)

If fruits are exempted from the measure prohibiting the use of foodstuffs for the manufacture of distilled liquors, we not only leave the way open but give direct encouragement to the development of another spirits industry which will draw from the food supply by taking fruits, and those some of the commoner fruits necessary in several ways to the health of the people.

Anything that tends to reduce the available supply of these fruits, to make them expensive, either deprives the people of needed food constituents or compels them to seek them elsewhere through vegetables, grains, milk, eggs, etc., of which there is already a scarcity.

For health reasons, therefore, it is important that we should not encourage the greater use of fruits in making spirituous or various liquors, as will be the case if we do not include fruits among the foodstuffs prohibited in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages.

Again, such exemption will encourage the making of stronger alcoholic beverages than those produced from grains. The lightest wine has, on the average, a larger alcoholic content than strong beer. The fortified wines, as already stated, contain from 14 to 24 per cent alcohol. Fruit brandy contains from 40 to 60 per cent of alcohol, as against from 40 to 50 per cent in whisky.

From the point of view of conserving man power as well as foodstuffs, we shall therefore gain nothing by opening the way to a larger production and use of wine and brandy. No one can doubt for a moment that if the use of grain is prohibited in the manufacture of whisky, rum, and fermented liquors, and the use of fruits is not prohibited, we shall see a lively increase of activity among the wine and brandy producers.

THE DRUNKENNESS OF HISTORY MOSTLY ON WINE.

There is nothing in the history of the nations that gives us any reason to suppose that this will be anything but a detriment to the efficiency of the Nation at a time when every particle of energy is required.

As long as human deeds have been recorded, whether in song and story or on stones, papyrus, or printed page, the record has contained accounts of man's drunkenness. Edicts and exhortations against it are found in the most ancient writings of China, India, and Persia. In Egypt its origin is credited to Isis or Osiris. Pompeii had a statue of Bacchus. The Bible contains many references to drunkenness. It closed the career of Alexander the Great and many of the high and low in ancient Greece and Rome.

But the drunkenness of the ancients was wine, beer, or cider drunkenness. The accredited inventor of distillation died in 1106 A. D., hence whisky and other distilled liquors were not responsible for the intemperance of the olden times.

THE WOES OF WINE IN FRANCE.

At the beginning of the present war France abolished absinthe, but left her wine and brandy and other liquors. Here is what is said by a poster issued in 1916 by the French Society Against Alcoholism, the honorary president of which is M. Raymond Poincaré, the President of France:

L'ALARME.

[Société Francaise D'Action Contre Alcoolisme; honorary president, M. Raymond Poincaré.]

To French women and French young people:

1. Alcohol is as formidable an enemy to you as Germany.

2. It has cost France since 1870 in men and in money more than the present war.

3. Alcohol pleases the taste; but, a veritable poison, it destroys the body.

4. Drinkers grow old early. They lose half their normal life and are easy prey to numerous weaknesses and maladies.

5. The "little glasses" of parents are transformed into hereditary weaknesses in their descendents. France has to-day about 200,000 insane, twice as many consumptives, to say nothing of the victims of gout, scrofula, rickets, premature degeneracy, and the majority of criminals.

6. Alcoholism reduces our productivity two-thirds, increases the cost of living and misery.

7. Like the criminal Kaiser, alcoholism decimates and ruins France, to the great joy of Germany. Mothers, young people, husbands, fight alcoholism and remember the glorious wounded and dead for the country.

8. You will thus accomplish a great task, equaling that of our heroic soldiers.

This poster was approved by M. Clementel, minister of commerce, and was placed by direction of the under secretary of the health service in all offices under his direction. This is a French declaration after absinthe was prohibited; wine and spirits remain.

France and Italy have been through the experience that lies before us if we open the way to a larger production of wine and spirits made from wine. After the grapevine pest, phylloxera, was conquered in France numerous regions previously devoted to grain were converted into vineyards. If France had this acreage still producing grain, it would now be helping out her food supply. Overproduction of wine encouraged its conversion into spirits. To-day there are not far from 2,500,000 wine and cider producers and a million home distillers (Fréderic Riemain, secretary of the Le Ligue Nationale contre L'Alcoolisme, 1916), and these constitute a body of interests which have blocked every effort during the war to free France from the handicap which drink places upon her, as stated in the poster already presented. The French press publishes lively demands that the spirits be requisitioned and turned to military and industrial uses instead of into the stomachs of the people. "Alcohol," said Le Figaro a few months ago, "is at the same time one of the best aids to national defense—in the powder mills—and one of its most cruel enemies—in the stomachs of the workmen in war industrial establishments. Who dares hesitate to choose between these uses?"

A recent book by Jean Finot, editor of La Revue, which has been passed by the censor, portrays some of the conditions with which France is struggling, due to her wine-spirits interests. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 4, p. 1802.) It shows that the wine and spirits shops undermine the health and morals of the soldiers when off duty; drinking in convalescence retards or prevents recovery from wounds, increases infractions of discipline, handicaps employers in the production of munitions, delays transportation of supplies. Many of the generals have found it necessary to take measures to protect the soldiers at the front. Gen. Joffre forbade absolutely the sale of alcohol and of alcoholic drinks to soldiers of all grades in the army zone. He specified as forbidden "absinthe, bitters, vermonite, liqueurs, fruit spirits, and all other alcoholic liquids not specified." He forbade soldiers to accept as a gift any amount whatever of the drinks above named, and announced that any seller violating this rule would be brought before the police and military courts, and that he would go so far as to definitely close up establishments guilty of violating this decree. Such are the difficulties which France has had during the war after prohibiting what was believed to be her worst enemy—absinthe—and leaving wine, fruit spirits, and other drinks.

How was it before the war?

An official proclamation in Paris as long ago as 1903, written by Dr. Débove, dean of the faculty of medicine, and Dr. Faisans, physician to the principal general hospital of Paris, declared that "alcoholism is chronic poisoning, resulting from the habitual use of alcohol, even when not taken in amounts sufficient to produce drunkenness. The so-called hygienic drinks (wine, beer, and cider) also contain alcohol. The man who daily drinks an immoderate amount of wine, of cider, or of beer becomes as surely alcoholic as the one who drinks brandy. Alcoholism causes a great variety of diseases. It is one of the most frightful scourges, whether regarded from the point of view of the health of the individual, of the existence of the faculty, or of the future of the nation."

Such was the official warning given in wine and fruit-spirits drinking France 15 years ago.

A report to the French Academy of Medicine in 1907 by Dr. Fernet showed that among 1,500 deaths in hospitals and insane asylums in Paris, more than one-third were due in part to alcoholism; alcoholism was a contributory cause in 23.6 per cent of the cases; the sole cause in 10.2 per cent.

How cheapness and abundance of wine (such as would be fostered if we do not include fruits among the foodstuffs to be conserved) did not tend to promote temperance in France is shown by a survey by Ernest Massard in the St. Antoine quarter of Paris in 1901. Of 500 patients who came under his observation in the hospital, the average used from 4 to 5 quarts of wine a day; 56 who declared they were never drunk used from 1 to 2 quarts of wine a day and brandy, rum, and absinthe in addition, and 400 of the 500 patients showed signs of alcoholism.

"The scourge of drink," wrote M. Bourgeois, an ex-cabinet minister, "has a permanent place in all our social miseries. We meet it everywhere. It hides itself behind tuberculosis, in insanity, in crime, but it is always at the bottom of our evils and degeneracies."

An enormous increase in tuberculosis in France has been one of the serious developments of the war in consequence of trench life and conditions. But long before the war physicians had called attention to the fact that statistics on the consumption of alcohol according to departments in France showed a parallel with those of tuberculosis. Dr. Jacques Bertillon declared that "alcohol appears to be the most deadly cause of the weakening of the organism in preparation for tuberculosis. It is the master cause. All other causes disappear in comparison." Dr. Roubinovitch, of the Saltpetriere, declared: "They talk about the great scourge, tuberculosis, which decimates France. The greatest scourge, however, is alcoholism. It is this which gives up the key to the house and permits the sacking. There is no more burning question than the battle against this cause of all other scourges." And, again, Dr. Landowzy in picturesque phrase declared, "Alcoholism prepares the bed for tuberculosis."

Figures compiled in 1907 under the direction of the French ministry of the interior (La Sémaine Médicale, July 10, 1907) showed that of 71,551 inmates of insane asylums 9,932, or 13.6 per cent, were there as the direct or indirect result of alcohol.

These facts are not cited as any derogation of our great ally whose splendid spirit and achievements we in this war hail with honor. But they do show that the nation which has freely produced and used wine could not stop there, but passed on to the use of fruit brandy and worse liquors, and that it has suffered before the war and during the war from all the consequences that we had seen from other alcoholic liquors.

SWITZERLAND'S WARNING AGAINST WINE.

Switzerland, another wine-using country, found that alcoholism developed in alarming proportions.

In 1885 the Government took a Government monopoly of the manufacture and sale of distilled liquors, and has ever since appropriated a part of the profits to preventing drunkenness and the curing of inebriates. The use of brandy decreased as a result of the monopoly, but the use of wine increased from 38 liters per person in 1884 to 69 liters in 1898. One of the ardent advocates of the monopoly legislation, E. W. Milliet, of Bern, found on comparing the consumption of actual alcohol that during the five-year period 1880–1884 preceding the adoption of the spirits monopoly the average per capita consumption of actual alcohol was 14.3 liters. In the decade 1892–1902, although the consumption of distilled liquors had decreased, the consumption of wine had so greatly increased that the actual per capita consumption of alcohol had gained by 10 per cent and amounted to 15.78 liters per capita, as against 14.3 liters before the impetus was given to wine drinking by adoption of the spirits monopoly.

The actual increase was even greater, as during the interval thousands of Swiss had become total abstainers.

ITALY'S LESSON OF WINE PERILS.

Italy, too, a wine producing and using country, shows a growing tragedy from drink.

Dr. Leonardo Bianchi published in Nuova Antologia (August, 1916) a long article on the development of the wine industry in Italy and its economic disadvantages to a country which has to import so heavily its grain supplies. He urges that there be no extension of vine cultivation, that vines destroyed by the phylloxera be not replaced, that instead the land be used for the cultivation of wheat and other grains greatly needed by Italy.

But here, too, is a physical problem similar to that of France. "The problem for Italy," says Dr. Bianchi, "is not so much attention to acute alcoholism (drunkenness) as to chronic intoxication, which slowly and daily undermines the vigor of the country.

"In all such diseases as apoplexy, epilepsy, hysteria, general paralysis, progressive paralysis, and insanity, suicide, alcohol holds a not insignificant place as a cause." But while he considers that only one-fifth of these deaths were attributable in part to alcohol, they mount into tens of thousands in a period of years. And "between these and the perfectly healthy of a race is a large zone which swarms with human weaklings, delinquents, those brutal to wives and children, deaf to the voice of conscience, and the children who suffer in the higher mental functions from the influence of alcoholic intoxication in the parents."

Dr. Gina Lombroso-Ferrero, daughter of the great criminologist Lombroso and wife of the historical Ferrero, says of alcoholism in Italy in a recent article: "The whole drink problem is being grappled with determinedly in Italy at the present time. The recent increase in alcoholism has been so tremendous as to cause anxiety in Government circles and among people interested in social questions.

"The epidemic of alcoholism is all the more remarkable in a country like Italy, because it was practically free from it 30 years ago. Our experts assign to the evil two main causes—the stupendous spread of industrialism employing machinery, and overproduction by wine growers.

"From 1890, and still more from 1900 onward, the evil grew. Official statistics show that the quantity of wine consumed per inhabitant in 1884 was 72½ liters (a liter is slightly more than a quart); in 1905 it was 111½ liters. As to beer, the figures for 1879 is 0.50 liter per head, and for 1905, 0.89. Consumption of distilled alcohol jumped from 0.49 per head to over 1 liter. These figures are in reality much below the truth, as they do not cover contraband or illicit drinking. The anti-alcohol league of Milan recently made a special inquiry, which showed that consumption per head of all forms of alcohol in Milan had increased threefold in 25 years.

"Parallel with this increased drinking runs a corresponding rise in the death rate, which was only 1.5 per 100,000 inhabitants in 1887, and which in 1909 had risen to 4 per 100,000.

"It follows as a matter of course that cases of insanity kept pace with the increase in alcoholic consumption. Dr. Paolo Amaldi, director of the Florence Asylum and one of the leaders of the Italian Anti-alcohol League, who has for many years conducted a minute inquiry into the causes of insanity, has found that in the three years 1903–1905 out of a total of 38,764 asylum inmates (22,168 men, 16,596 women) the cases due to drink numbered 3,398 (3,075 men, 323 women). But these figures nearly doubled in the triennial period 1909–11, the total inmates crazed through drink being 7,092.

"Crime, too, kept pace. The ministry of justice has issued statistics showing that in 1906 the proportion of crimes due to drink was 4.46 per cent; by 1909 it had risen to 6.41 per cent, with an increase in the number of condemnations from 6,468 to 9,302. In addition the courts found for the same year that drink caused irresponsibility for various offenses in 5,426 cases. On this aspect of the drink evil Lombroso wrote:

"'Crime grows apace with pauperism. The old saying, in the presence of every unsolved criminal mystery, "Look for the woman," might be completed, perhaps corrected, by adding "or the bottle." Prof. Ferril discovered the curious fact that in France, while crimes of bodily injury diminished notably during a given period, they showed a marked increase in the month of November, which is the wine-gathering season. And Sclopis declared in our own Parliament that nine-tenths of the crimes committed in Italy were done in saloons.'"

THE WINE WAY TO DRUNKENNESS PICTURED.

Vance Thompson, the well-known journalist, in a recent book speaks out of personal observation of what has happened in France and Italy: "The greater part of my life I have lived in wine countries. Always one remembers the best of life; the dirty and tragic parts slip out of mind. * * * And so with the wine lands. Go to the real facts of life—banish the haze of poetic fancy—and what you see is not the cannikin-clinking merriment of comic opera but a sadder, drearier way of life.

"I am speaking of lands where the grapes grow, where wine is 'natural, pure, and cheap.' It is there at its best. The alcohol, always a poison, is in its least harmful form concealed in the beneficent juice of the grape—hidden in suavity and perfume. And what it does to the race of men, dwellers in sunlight, you know; for you have shuddered at these crippled and distorted generations, with their beggars and idiots, bearing one and all to the eye of the physiologist the stigmate of alcoholic penalties.

"No drunkenness in southern Europe?

"He who makes that statement speaks out of deep ignorance. He has never dwelt in the villages of Province or wandered over the wide roads of Italy. You do not, I admit, see so wild and manifest a drunkenness as in the harsh, northern, spirit-drinking lands; but the southern drinker, making up in quantity what was wanting in the alcoholic strength of his beverage, reaches the same stage of physical impairment, begets the same poisoned offspring, dies in the same kind of alcoholic dissolution—to use the technical phrase. His moral corruption, as his physical degeneration, is slower in its progress; but statistics must be piled hospital high to show it reaches the same end. * * *

"It was in my horoscope to watch for 20 years the growth of the alcohol habit in France. I saw the nation weary of the too feeble intoxicant of wine and take to strong drink. During those years the drinking of absinthe alone arose from an annual consumption of 1,000,000 gallons to over 5,000,000 gallons. The French race, with dangerous deterioration, turned from the slow poison of wine to the fiercer and more active of alcohol poisons—to the wilder alcohol of amers and absinthes.

"With what fine spiritual energy, born of battle peril, France drew herself back from the abyss of racial degeneration you shall see, but assuredly she was going—even as the wine boy is making for whisky drunkenness—toward the alcoholic deterioration which is national deterioration, which is national death.

"Let there be no doubt about it; the wine way to drunkenness is a way like any other. You say it is cleaner, with gayer prospects and brighter skies? Nine-tenths of that is cant and cheap apologia of second-rate, brandy-loosened poets. It is not a clean way—if you have followed the trail of the wine drunkard, home faring."

Thus the experience of three wine-producing and wine-using countries show that wine production, when encouraged, tends to divert to this purpose land needed for other foods so long as the growers produce grapes for wine instead of for food or nonalcoholic drinks. In all three countries the tendency has been toward an increased use of wine, leading to chronic alcoholism, with all its physical and moral waste of human power and efficiency. In both France and Italy, but especially in France, it has led to production and use of spirits, which has intensified the evils of alcoholism and which to-day, in the midst of this world war, is a tremendous handicap in affecting the food supply, in reducing the present effectiveness of the nation, in reestablishing normal industrial relations which must be restored as rapidly as possible, and in impairing the future generations.

HOW NOT TO DO IT.

For the United States now to leave open the way to these losses by giving the wine and fruit brandy industries an opportunity to enlarge and take the place of beer and whisky is to ignore the solemn lessons of experience which are already written large in tragedy in the national life of these other nations.

If the United States really intends to stop waste of food and human power by alcohol, it must include the prohibition of the use of fruits as well as of grain in the manufacture of liquor for beverage purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Just before the call of a quorum I rose and made a parliamentary inquiry which has not yet been settled, and I should like to have it settled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it now.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to have the Chair settle it, so that we may know exactly what we are doing. I wish to call the Chair's attention to the fact that section 12, which we are now considering, contains the original House provision, with the original amendment made by the Agricultural Committee; and there has been read here an amendment introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], which is in the form of a substitute for that section. Now, what I want to know is, are we not permitted to perfect section 12 as it came originally from the committee, this amendment of the Senator from Oregon being in the nature of a substitute which, under our rules, is simply a motion to strike out the entire section and amend by the insertion of a new section? There is no section to strike out until we perfect the amendment of the committee. As I understand the rules, we have the right first to perfect the House amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, may I suggest, as a part of the parliamentary inquiry, that, as I understand it, the original section 12 which came over from the House was proposed to be amended by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Now, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, through its chairman, has offered another amendment, which takes the place of its first amendment. That leaves the language of the House section 12 as it came over here the pending question, with the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, a motion to strike out and insert; so that the two matters to be considered are the House language in section 12 and the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon. I think that must be so.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair get a clear understanding. Section 12 as contained in the bill is now before the Senate, and has certain committee amendments in it. Does the Chair understand that the committee has withdrawn the amendments as shown in the printed bill and offered in lieu of the House text this amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is correct, Mr. President. May I make this further statement? It is true that section 12 of the House bill was amended in committee, and it was reported out with those amendments, but subsequently the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry reported out a substitute for what they had done in committee. So the pending amendment is the committee amendment. It was not the purpose of the unanimous-consent agreement to prevent the perfecting of the House provision or what is contained in the bill as originally reported out from the Senate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that the committee has withdrawn the committee amendments to section 12?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the first report of the committee, but the committee amendment that is now pending was reported out on the 28th of June, and takes the place of the former committee amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think there has been any action in the Senate withdrawing the amendment, and my point is that a committee amendment coming in that way has no more force than if it were an amendment introduced by an individual Senator as a substitute, except, of course, it now has the sanction of a majority of the committee behind it; but from a parliamentary standpoint it does not seem to me to be in any better situation than if an individual Senator would have offered the substitute.

It makes no difference when it comes in, but I want a fair understanding of the matter before we commence to vote. I should like to have a vote between the original House provision and the original Senate amendment which is before us now, and then, if the former fails, of course a vote would come upon any substitute to strike out and insert. It has been held here squarely that we have a right to vote upon and perfect the section to be stricken out. How can a substitute strike out something that is not in the bill?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order, and I wish to state the point of order. Yesterday I sent to the desk a proposed amendment to the Chamberlain amendment, and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] offered a substitute for the Chamberlain amendment. I contend that the amendment I offered should be disposed of first, that we should be allowed to perfect the Chamberlain amendment before we know whether we want to adopt the substitute offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion in reference to the point of order, not in the discussion of the amendment of the Senator from Oregon——

Mr. MYERS. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will state to the Chair that neither the amendment of the Senator from Montana nor my own amendment has been formally offered. I have the floor now, and expect during my time to offer that amendment.

Mr. MYERS. But my point of order is that my amendment should come first.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator can not take me off the floor on the theory that he wants to offer an amendment when I have the floor for the purpose of discussing an amendment that is already pending.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator stated that he is going to offer a substitute, and it might be voted on before I can offer mine.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the Senator permit me a moment on the question of order?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as to the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Kansas, the situation is very simple. The unanimous-consent agreement, according to the ruling of the previous occupant of the chair, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], and I think it is entirely correct, is that by virtue of that agreement the Chamberlain amendment, which is the committee amendment, is the pending question; that is, the motion to strike out and insert, and it is to that question that I wish to address myself, if I am given the opportunity of doing so. The Senator from Kansas will be afforded his own opportunity, and the Senator from Montana will have an opportunity of offering any amendment that he desires.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, let us settle this question so that there can not be any doubt about it. There is not any doubt but that the committee had a perfect right to withdraw the amendment that it proposed to section 12, prior to the consideration by the Senate, and to offer a substitute for section 12 in the nature of an amendment. That leaves before the Senate the original section 12 of the House and the proposed amendment of the committee in the nature of a motion to strike out and insert, each of which is open to amendment, the part to be stricken out being first subject to amendment. The Senator from Kansas has a perfect right hereafter, not in the time of the Senator from Arkansas, to offer upon his own behalf the amendment now printed to section 12 of the bill and to have a vote upon it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does not the action of the Senate have to be taken before a committee or a Senator can withdraw an amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; when a committee reports an amendment the committee can withdraw the amendment before any action has been taken. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment which I intend to offer, in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture, forbids the use of foods, food materials, or feeds in the manufacture of distilled spirits for beverage purposes.

The amendment of the Senate Committee on Agriculture carries substantially the same provision and in addition authorizes the President to limit, regulate, or prohibit the use of foods or feeds in the production of vinous, malt, or fermented liquors whenever he shall find that such action is necessary in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food.

The original provision as it passed the House forbade the manufacture of distilled spirits and also of vinous, malt, or fermented liquors.

It became apparent that controversy over this feature of the bill was delaying its passage, and the President, who regards the early enactment of food-control legislation as indispensable to the efficient and successful conduct of the war, suggested to representatives of the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America that vinous, malt, and fermented liquors be eliminated from the bill. His letter making this suggestion has been published in the press. It is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., June 29, 1917.

MY DEAR DR. CANNON: I am very glad to respond to the request of Senator MARTIN, the Democratic floor leader in the Senate, that I give to your legislative committee an expression of my opinion with regard to the wisest and most patriotic policy to be pursued toward the food administration legislation now pending in the Congress.

I regard the immediate passage of the bill as of vital consequence to the safety and defense of the Nation. Time is of the essence; and yet it has become evident that heated and protracted debate will delay the passage of the bill indefinitely if the provisions affecting the manufacture of beer and wines are retained and insisted upon. In these circumstances I have not hesitated to say to Members of the Senate who have been kind enough to consult me that it would undoubtedly be in the public interest in this very critical matter if the friends of those provisions should consent to their elimination from the present measure. Feeling that your committee is actuated by the same patriotic motives which inspire me, I am confident that these considerations will seem to you, as they seem to me, to be imperative.

With much respect, sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

Rev. JAMES CANNON, JR., D. D.,
Chairman Legislative Committee,
Anti-Saloon League of America.

The legislative committee, the general superintendent, and the legislative superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America promptly accepted the President's proposition, and, in so far as they were concerned, agreed to the elimination of vinous, malted, or fermented liquors from the pending bill, reserving, however, the right to urge hereafter the passage of legislation prohibiting the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beer and wines either in the form of a separate bill or in connection with other war legislation.

The reply of the representatives of the Anti-Saloon League to the President's letter has also been published. It is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 30, 1917.

To the PRESIDENT,
White House, Washington, D. C.:

We have earnestly considered the statement in your letter of yesterday to the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America that in the face of the present food crisis you are greatly concerned lest the early passage of the food-administration legislation now pending in Congress be jeopardized by a heated and protracted debate upon certain sections of the bill relating to the manufacture of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquors.

We are aware of the threats made by the friends of beer and wine in the Senate of an indefinite and protracted filibuster against those provisions of the bill. We beg to assure you that, as patriotic Americans, determined to uphold you as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in the present war, we will not, for our constituency, offer any obstruction to the prompt passage of the food-control bill.

Of course we can not presume to indicate to Members of Congress what action they should take in view of this request from the President of the United States. They will doubtless act in accordance with their own convictions of duty.

We are glad to note that your request applies only to the pending food-administration legislation. It will be our purpose to urge the passage of legislation prohibiting the waste of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beer and wines at the earliest possible date, either in the form of a separate bill or in connection with other war legislation. We assure you of our purpose as patriotic American citizens to cooperate in every possible way in the winning of the great war in which our Nation is engaged.

Sincerely and respectfully, yours,

JAMES CANNON, Jr.,
ARTHUR J. BARTON,
WAYNE B. WHEELER,
E. H. CHERRINGTON,
Legislative Committee.
P. A. BAKER,
General Superintendent.
E. C. DINWIDDIE,
Legislative Superintendent.

My substitute for the committee amendment conforms in letter and in spirit to the compromise suggested by the President and agreed to by the Anti-Saloon League. The committee provision is objectionable because it imposes upon the President a function which is clearly legislative and which Congress ought to exercise itself whenever conditions justify or require.

In the next place the committee provision is not only subject to criticism because it expressly imposes upon the Chief Executive duties which are legislative in their nature, but it is also objectionable to Senators on the other side of the Chamber because they claim it confers a great political power and influence upon the Executive. It is urged that the existence of authority of the President to confiscate hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property through the activities of agents upon whose judgment and conduct he must necessarily depend is unprecedented and unreasonable. Expressing no approval of this argument, I mention it merely to emphasize the fact that unless the Congress determines this question for itself the passage of the food-control bill will probably be indefinitely delayed.

As a still further objection to the committee provision it may be said that since Congress is likely to be in almost continuous session during the war, the Executive would be very slow to exercise the power sought to be conferred upon him, and would likely relegate the matter to Congress. Therefore nothing is accomplished by its passage.

Much has been said, and no doubt more will be, during the progress of this debate concerning the subject of bone-dry prohibition. No doubt the sentiment in favor of national prohibition is growing. The prohibition issue, however, is not directly involved in this legislation, nor can it be. No provision suggested to this bill contemplates national prohibition.

This, of course, is due to the fact that under the Constitution no power exists in Congress to enact a statute forbidding the sale or use throughout the Nation of liquors as a beverage. Before such legislation can be passed an amendment to the Constitution is required. The question in Congress is therefore confined to food-conservation measures, and does not seek to prevent the importation or sale of alcoholic beverages. If none were manufactured in the United States, it would still be possible to import such beverages from foreign countries and sell them here. If the manufacture of liquors should be totally suspended in the United States, we would not and could not have prohibition. Importation would probably be increased and the total consumption would probably be diminished because of the inevitably higher prices which would prevail.

Mr. President, I offer the following amendment. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment. I offer it as a substitute for the committee provision. It is to strike out the committee amendment and insert the following in lieu thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the part proposed to be inserted by the committee insert:

SEC. 12. That from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no person shall use any foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of distilled liquors, except for governmental, industrial, scientific, or medicinal purposes. Any person who willfully violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I address myself now to the amendment which I have just offered.

Importation would probably be increased and the total consumption would probably be diminished because of the inevitably higher prices which would prevail. It is also true that such legislation might tend to promote national prohibition through the adoption of the necessary constitutional amendment and statute. If the committee provision prevails, national prohibition will, in my judgment, be postponed until after the war. By the adoption of the substitute, which as stated represents the compromise agreed upon between the President and the representatives of the Anti-Saloon League, everything of probable benefit will be accomplished that is likely to be done under the committee provision. The manufacture of distilled spirits in the United States will be suspended, and an enormous amount of food materials which would enter into the same if manufacture were continued, will be conserved. Of course a part of it may be shipped abroad and used there in the production of distilled spirits.

If the manufacture of beer is suspended, the price of that beverage will be greatly increased, because after a short time only imported beer can be obtained. Many influences are at work to create unrest and dissatisfaction in the great industrial centers where it is of supreme importance that nothing occur to disturb the peaceful and contented attitude of laborers. In some localities, at least, it is probable that great dissatisfaction will temporarily grow out of the increase in the price of malt liquors, which must occur if manufacture of beer be at once suspended. I do not think this condition could be permanent or of far-reaching importance, but it is worthy of consideration.

Congress is proceeding rapidly with temperance legislation, and it is proceeding within the Constitution. We have recently passed the Webb-Kenyon Act making interstate shipments of liquors subject to State prohibition laws. That was a great step forward. We have also enacted prohibition for the District of Columbia. In the Army bill of the present year the sale of intoxicating liquors to soldiers in uniform is prohibited and penalized. Congress has also forbidden the publishing of liquor advertisements in prohibition territory. By the legislation now proposed we are suspending the manufacture of distilled liquors. It is not remarkable in view of this record that many of the friends of temperance should be willing and anxious to avoid the reactionary movements which must inevitaby result from ill-considered legislation calculated to accomplish nothing of benefit and pregnant with possibilities of evil. The overshadowing consideration in the minds and hearts of all patriots is to win the war against Germany and vindicate the right of our citizens to life, liberty, and the peaceful pursuit of their lawful avocations; to preserve the spirit of liberty and enkindle the fires of democracy beneath the thrones of autocracy. I have no doubt that all Senators, indeed, all Members of Congress, are imbued with this spirit and purpose. The war, for the present at least, is to be fought in France. Congress can not regulate the liquor question there. However closely the promotion of temperance may be associated with progress, the mere existence of a state of war does not empower Congress to enact national prohibition. I believe this substitute represents a sane, reasonable, and fair solution of the present controversy and that it will promote the speedy passage of this bill.

Mr. MYERS. I offer an amendment to the Chamberlain amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Amend the committee amendment designated as section 12 by inserting between the word "spirits" and the word "for" in line 3, page 1, of the printed amendment the words "or of vinous, malt, or fermented liquors."

Further amend the committee amendment by striking out all thereof after line 3, on page 1, of the printed amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Montana is not now in order.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on the point of order. I contend that we have a right to perfect the Chamberlain amendment before we vote on the substitute for it. The Senator from Arkansas offers a substitute for the Chamberlain amendment. The Senate has a right to take the Chamberlain amendment in hand and fix it up in the way a majority of the Senate want it before the substitute is voted on, because we do not know whether we would perfect the substitute on the Chamberlain amendment until a majority of the Senate takes the Chamberlain amendment and puts it in the shape it wishes it. Therefore I contend that my amendment should be considered ahead of any substitute for the entire section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is amendable. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon is a proposition to strike out and insert and, under Rule XVIII of the Senate rules, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted must, for purposes of amendment, be regarded as a question. This rule makes the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] an amendment of the first degree. This amendment itself is therefore clearly open to amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the following amendment to the House provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 18 strike out line 16 down to and including the word "beverages" on line 21 and insert the following:

SEC. 12. That no person shall use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcohol, except for governmental, industrial, scientific, medicinal, sacramental, or other nonbeverage purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is not now in order, and I would like to be heard on it for just a moment, if the Chair will hear me.

Mr. CURTIS. I offered it on the statement of the Presiding Officer.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Chair give me just a moment on the point of order? I shall take only a moment. I am clearly satisfied the Chair overlooks the language of the unanimous-consent agreement. It is true that under the rule of the Senate the House provision would be first perfected, but under the unanimous-consent agreement it is as expressly provided that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon shall be first perfected. The language in that express provision is this:

That the amendment proposed by the committee, with such amendments as may be offered to it—

Which makes my amendment in order; it is subject to being perfected—shall be first considered, and that the section as finally amended in Committee of the Whole—

And so forth.

That reverses by unanimous consent of the Senate the rule of the Senate, which would ordinarily apply, requiring that the Senate shall first perfect the House provision. It is an anomalous situation. I will say that I think it is the only construction that the language justifies. What effect could be given to the provision that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon and such amendments as may be offered to it shall be first considered unless you do give it the construction and effect that I am insisting upon, and that is that before you perfect the House provision you first perfect this amendment. In other words, the substantive proposition now before the Senate, the one that takes the place of everything else, is the amendment which the Senator from Oregon has offered for the amendment reported by the committee, and the committee amendment, by virtue of the unanimous-consent agreement, becomes the pending question, and, by the express language of the agreement and such amendments as may be offered to it, must first be perfected before we can take up the House provision.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the agreement applies to only the Senate amendment and was not intended in any way to change the rule in reference to the vote being first had upon the House provision. The agreement applies to only such Senate amendments that might be offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not the business of the Chair to construe unanimous-consent agreements made by the Senate. It is a senatorial construction.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Chair is right in ruling that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas is in order. Rule XVI provides that when an amendment is offered by way of a substitute the substitute and the original House provision can be amended with a view of perfecting them. The Senator from Kansas offered an amendment to the House provision to perfect it. The first vote will come on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas as perfected, but the vote should not come upon the amendment of the Senator from Kansas until the House provision is also perfected, so that the Senate shall know exactly what it is voting upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ruling of the Chair has not been changed on the subject at all. This must be construed in the light of the rules of the Senate in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. HOLLIS. I understood the Chair to rule that the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas is in order. If so, it is the pending amendment until it is disposed of, and another amendment can not be also before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is in order, and as it is the purpose of both the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Arkansas to strike out the original House text, the original House text is first to be perfected.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then the effect of the ruling of the Chair is that there can be two motions pending at the same time, and that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is to be passed upon before the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the effect of the ruling of the Chair is that if an amendment to the House text is offered and there be no amendment pending to it, that amendment is in order and takes precedence.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, in connection with this question I beg to call the attention of the Chair to a decision of the former President pro tempore, Senator Clarke of Arkansas, on page 259 of the Precedents, wherein it is held exactly as the Chair has held at the present time. The statement of the President pro tempore then was:

A substitute under our rules is practically a motion to strike out and insert; it constitutes two questions. The friends of the original text of the bill may perfect it—

Just as the Senator from Kansas proposes to do—if they so desire, before the question is put on the adoption of the substitute; but if no amendment shall be offered to the original bill, the question will be on the adoption of the substitute.

The unanimous-consent agreement was made in view of the rules of the Senate——

Mr. ROBINSON. May I be indulged for a few words more?

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment on this question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas, and I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to it, the words the Senator from Kansas proposes to strike out in his amendment are committee words and were put in by the committee originally. The committee have withdrawn that amendment, so his amendment is not in order because it proposes to strike out words even the committee have not proposed.

The words proposed to be stricken out by his amendment are:

That from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act.

The committee have withdrawn that, as I understand it. So the amendment is not in order from that standpoint.

Mr. THOMPSON. The committee certainly can not withdraw the House text of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from North Carolina is correct in his suggestion. The language which the Senator seeks to strike out is not in the House provision. It is in an amendment heretofore reported by the committee, and withdrawn by the committee. So the Senator is seeking to strike out something that has been heretofore withdrawn. He does not address his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, which is the pending question, nor does he address it to the language in the House provisions, but he addresses his amendment to the language which was first reported by the Senate committee and afterwards withdrawn by it. Therefore he is striking out something which has already been withdrawn.

But in addition to that, the remark has been made that the rules of the Senate govern the matter. Mr. President, the object of the unanimous-consent agreement is to suspend the operation of the rule. Everyone understands that. The plain effect of this provision, and it must be construed according to its language, is that the first thing to be considered is the Chamberlain amendment, and that that must be perfected together with such amendments as may be offered to it. That plainly makes the amendment which I have offered subject to amendment, in my judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that there is an orderly way of overruling the Chair by taking an appeal.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the suggestion of the Chair is wise, and because the Chair has intimated that the Senate ought to settle it, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. STONE. Will the Chair state his decision?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that notwithstanding the express terms of the unanimous-consent agreement the amendment proposed by the committee with such amendments as may be offered to it shall be first considered, and that the amendment being one to strike out section 12 and insert a different section, the original section 12 is first subject to amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] stated. If it is true that it simply strikes out what was proposed as a committee amendment, but never offered as a committee amendment, and leaves the provision as it came to the Senate, then there is nothing to strike out and nothing to insert, and the Senator's object would be accomplished by voting down the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in order to cut off debate, I move to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not debating the matter. I have a right to have the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to know what the amendment is. The Secretary will please state it.

The SECRETARY. Mr. CURTIS offers the following amendment: On page 18, to strike out, beginning with line 16, down to and including the word "beverages," in line 21, and to insert the following:

SEC. 12. That no person shall use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcoholic beverages or of alcohol except for governmental, industrial, scientific, medicinal, or sacramental purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in order that the Senate may understand the purpose of the amendment, may I state that all it proposes to do is to transpose the words "or of alcoholic beverages" in the House provision in order to make the section read as it was originally intended it should read. Were the language left as it now is, it would not accomplish what was intended to be accomplished by it. I hope the amendment may be adopted.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on laying the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have asked for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I desire to be counted as present.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the negative). I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ROBINSON. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—55.

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid on the table.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] by inserting between the word "spirits" and the word "for," in line 3, of page 1, of the printed amendment, the words "or of vinous, malt, or fermented liquors."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has an amendment pending.

Mr. CURTIS. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I have an amendment pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MYERS. I did not understand the Senator's amendment was pending to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is pending to the original bill.

Mr. MYERS. Is not the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas pending? It was received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thought the Senate had just settled that question.

Mr. MYERS. Then, it is not in order to amend his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has an amendment pending. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment to the House text, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "beverages," on page 18, line 21, it is proposed to insert:

No alcoholic beverage shall be imported into the United States during the existing war, and no part of the distilled spirits now in bond in the United States shall be withdrawn during the said war to be used as a beverage.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the House provision of the bill as against either of the amendments which have been heretofore proposed; but I believe the House provision is weak in two respects: First, there is nothing to prevent the importation of alcoholic liquor. I understand that the revenue bill which is now before the Senate contains a provision of that kind, but we do not know what its fate will be. I have therefore proposed this as an amendment to the House provision.

One of the objections urged to the House provision is that the 300,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits now in bond can be used during the war for beverage purposes, and that we shall thereby convert this country into a whisky-drinking Nation. There is some force in the suggestion so repeatedly made that strong liquor is more objectionable than the weaker liquor; and the amendment that I have just proposed is intended to keep the distilled spirits in bond during the war, except in so far as they may be withdrawn for other purposes, or except in so far as the President of the United States may commandeer them for governmental purposes. The fundamental idea of the amendment is that we can prosecute the war in which we are now engaged more energetically and more efficiently without liquor than with it, and I want the opinion of the Senate upon that subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and I heartily approve of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which prohibits the importation of distilled liquors during the existing war with Germany after their manufacture has been prohibited in the United States. As the Senator from Iowa has stated, conservation not only of food but of human energy is sought to be accomplished in this bill.

I want to direct attention to the fact that David Lloyd-George, premier of England, has recently said:

We are fighting Germany, Austria, and drink. So far as I can see, the greatest of these three deadly foes is drink.

Von Moltke, who for many years was the commander in chief of the German forces, used this expression:

Beer is a far more dangerous enemy to Germany than all the armies of France.

Maj. Gen. Frederick Dent Grant used this language:

Ninety-five per cent of the desertions and acts of lawlessness in the Army are due to liquor. If I could by offering my body as a sacrifice free my country of this fell destroyer, drink, I would thank God for the privilege of doing it.

There is the testimony of three men, the most highly qualified judges possible to be found, and they practically say that we can not win this fight without adopting measures that will prevent the use of liquor.

Mr. President, some complaint is made that we purpose interfering with an industry, and that to enact prohibition legislation of this kind will cause that industry to suffer a great loss. When, however, that question is closely examined, it is found not to be serious. The provisions of this bill in regard to the prohibition of the manufacture of alcoholic liquors will apply only for the duration of the war. Consequently, if the war ends in six months all the loss sustained will simply be that resulting from closing the breweries and the distilleries for that period of time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to say just one word at this point, I wish to say that whenever the United States goes "dry" for two years, it will never return to the liquor traffic.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be true; and I hope there will never be a return to the traffic. We can then provide for an equitable arrangement.

Mr. President, there is also a clause in the House bill providing for the commandeering of distilled liquor, and when we consider that it takes 1 pint of alcohol to manufacture 1 pound of powder, and further, that at the present time in this war more powder is being used in every three minutes than was exploded in the three days' battle at Gettysburg, we can realize the extent of the demand there will be for alcohol for the purpose of manufacturing munitions of war. Consequently there should practically be no loss to the distillers by reason of the passage of this bill.

Mr. President, in every prohibition measure that has been presented or adopted in the States beers and wines have been included with distilled liquors.

Why is that? There must be some reason for it. It is true that beer is a milder drink than whisky; it is true that wine is a milder drink, but why are they always coupled with distilled liquors? It is because if they are not coupled the saloon is bound to exist. That is the reason. We will have wine saloons and we will have beer saloons, which will also mean a great deal of "bootlegging" of distilled spirits. It is only by including in prohibition measures all intoxicating liquors that we can get rid of the saloon.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that when we consider the fact that prohibition already exists in 24 or 25 States, the effect of this bill will not be so serious as Senators contend. The fact that there are large numbers of men employed in these industries is no indication that we are going to throw out of work permanently the 289,000 men now in the employ of the liquor industries. There is now a greater demand for labor at higher wages than has ever existed in the United States, and hence they will not remain without employment. That labor as now used is nothing but wasted energy—nay, more, it is used in the manufacture of that which weakens our energies and impairs our minds. According to a recent resolution of the American Medical Association, "alcohol is wholly without drug value, either as a tonic or stimulant or in any other therapeutic way." The imperative need of this crisis is the production and preservation of foods and the prohibition of the use of those things which impair our efficiency. It is only by the conversion of useless into productive labor that we can hope to win the war and thereby accomplish our high ideals in the preservation and extension of human liberty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I had not intended to address the Senate on the pending amendment relative to prohibition for the reason that I know full well that no amount of argument by another Senator could cause me to change my views, formed after due deliberation and careful thought on the subject of temperance, or as to the advisability of permitting the use of beer and wine during the war, and I am equally certain that nothing I may say will change very many of the votes that will be cast to-day on the amendment now pending relative to the manufacture and sale of wines and beers during the present war. But as a member of the Agricultural Committee that considered and reported this bill, I feel that I owe it to myself, my constituents, and the country to offer a few words of explanation relative to the action that I shall take to-day when the final vote on this question is taken; for I shall vote against this amendment and in favor of the House one, for the reason that I am opposed not only to the use of distilled liquors, but am also opposed to the use of wine and beer as beverages. What I shall say will be somewhat in the nature of a review of the history of the bill so far as it concerns the Senate and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

On June 25 H. R. 4961 was introduced, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. On June 26 the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry appointed a subcommittee, consisting of seven members, to consider the bill and make recommendations relative to the same to the full committee. The subcommittee appointed by the chairman agreed upon the following amendment.

Mr. President, I ask that this amendment be printed as a part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

(a) That from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to use in the manufacture of any intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes any perishable or nonperishable feeds, foods, or food materials. (b) Whenever the President shall find it necessary to conserve the perishable products referred to in the preceding paragraph he is empowered to permit the use of such products in the manufacture of vinous liquors; and when the question arises as to whether any particular product is perishable or nonperishable, or is suitable for foods or feeds, the President is authorized to determine that question, and his determination shall be conclusive for the purposes of this act. (c) Whenever in the judgment of the President the public interest would be subserved thereby he is empowered to permit the limited use of the materials mentioned in paragraph (a) of this section in the manufacture of malt or fermented liquors, and to prescribe the alcoholic contents thereof. (d) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be charged with the administration of this section, and he is authorized with the approval of the President to require the taking out of such permits, the keeping of such records, the execution of such bonds, and the observance of such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the execution of the same. (e) Any person who willfully violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. BRADY. On June 27, at a full meeting of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, after due consideration of H. R. 4961, adopted an amendment, which was in substance the House amendment forbidding the manufacture of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquors, with an exception of wine-making from fruits; and another amendment authorizing and directing the President to commandeer distilled liquors for war purposes was made mandatory. I ask, Mr. President, that the amendments referred to, being sections 12 and 13, be inserted in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The sections referred to are as follows:

SEC. 12. That from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no person shall use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcohol, except for governmental, industrial, scientific, medicinal, sacramental, or other nonbeverage purposes. Any person who willfully violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That whenever the President shall find it necessary to conserve perishable fruits he is empowered to permit the use of such perishable fruits in the manufacture of vinous liquors; and when the question arises as to whether any particular fruit is perishable or nonperishable the President is authorized to determine that question, and his determination shall be conclusive for the purposes of this act: Provided further, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be charged with the administration of this section, and he is authorized, with the approval of the President, to require the taking out of such permits, the keeping of such records, the execution of such bonds, and the observance of such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the execution of the same.

SEC. 13. That the President is authorized and directed to commandeer any or all distilled spirits in bond at the date of the approval of this act for redistillation in so far as such redistillation may be necessary to meet the requirements of the Government in the manufacture of munitions and other military and hospital supplies, or in so far as such redistillation would dispense with the necessity of utilizing products and materials suitable for foods and feeds in the future manufacture of distilled spirits for the purposes herein enumerated. The President shall determine and pay a just compensation for the distilled spirits so commandeered; and if the compensation so determined be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation for such spirits, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 142 of the Judicial Code.

Mr. BRADY. This amendment, with the full committee present, was adopted by a vote of 9 to 7, and the bill with this amendment was reported to the Senate and substituted for S. 2463; and the Senate commenced consideration of the bill and it was presumed by the minority, although they voted against the amendments offered to the House sections, that the matter was settled and that the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry would give their support to the measure as agreed upon by the full committee on June 27.

On June 29, 1917, the President wrote the following letter to Rev. James Cannon. I ask, Mr. President, that the letter of the President be inserted in the RECORD, without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

JUNE 29, 1917.

MY DEAR DR. CANNON: I am very glad to respond to the request of Senator MARTIN, the Democratic floor leader in the Senate, that I give your legislative committee an expression of my opinion with regard to the wisest and most patriotic policy to be purposed toward the food-administration legislation now pending in the Congress. I regard the immediate passage of the bill as of vital consequence to the safety and defense of the Nation. Time is of the essence; and yet it has become evident that heated and protracted debate will delay the passage of the bill indefinitely if the provisions affecting the manufacture of beer and wines are retained and insisted upon. In these circumstances I have not hesitated to say to Members of the Senate who have been kind enough to consult me that it would undoubtedly be in the public interest in this very critical matter if the friends of those provisions should consent to their elimination from the present measure. Feeling that your committee is actuated by the same patriotic motives which inspire me, I am confident that these considerations will seem to you, as they seem to me, to be imperative.

With much respect, sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Rev. JAMES CANNON, Jr., D. D.,
Chairman Legislative Committee
Anti-Saloon League of America.

Mr. BRADY. In consequence of this letter written by the President, the committee was again called together and the committee by a vote of 6 to 5 adopted the following amendment prohibiting the making of whisky and other distilled liquors and leaving beer and wine to the discretion of the President:

SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the manufacture of distilled spirits for beverage purposes. (b) Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such liquors is essential, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food or feed, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall have been given and shall remain unrevoked, no person shall, after a reasonable time, which shall be prescribed in such notice, use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of such vinous, malt, or fermented liquors except in accordance with the limitations, regulations, and prohibitions prescribed in such notice, or to produce any such liquors having an alcoholic content in excess of the amount prescribed therefor in such notice. When the question arises as to whether any particular product is suitable for food or feed, the question shall be determined by the President and his determination shall be conclusive for the purposes of this section. (c) Except as otherwise herein provided, the Commissioner of Internal-Revenue shall be charged with the administration of this section, and he is authorized, with the approval of the President, to require the taking out of such permits, the keeping of such records, the execution of such bonds, and the observance of such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the execution of the same. (d) Any person who willfully violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I voted against this amendment in the committee and reserved the right to oppose it on the floor of the Senate. It is plain to be seen that in consequence of the President's interposition the committee vote of 9 to 7 for the amendment above described was suddenly changed to a vote of 6 to 5 in favor of the amendment, leaving the manufacture of beer and wine to the discretion of the President. It is my desire and purpose to support the President whenever I can conscientiously do so, and I will do so whenever I believe that it will be for the benefit of my country or will contribute to the winning of the war; but I do not propose that the President shall set moral standards for me when in doing so we weaken rather than strengthen the defense of our country. No intoxicated general ever won a battle; no intoxicated soldier ever did effective service in the line of battle, and no man can produce food, fuel, or munitions of war, all of which are necessary for the defense of our country, if he spends his idle hours in drinking wine, beer, or intoxicating liquors of any kind, and I do not propose by my vote to place temptation before the young men that we are compelling by conscription and draft to sacrifice their lives, while we permit the slackers at home to consume by drink and to thus waste the products of the soil that we need so much to feed the needy and the hungry. If we ask the soldier to die for us, we ought to be willing to go dry for him.

I am in favor of the House provision, and I hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. President, I therefore ask to have inserted in my remarks the portions of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on pages 4584 and 4585, being a statement by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who has charge of the bill, and some remarks by the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], together with a telegram received by him and his answer to it. It seems to me that that part of the RECORD would be especially interesting at this time, and I hope that each and every Member of the Senate will again read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. * * * Mr. Hoover, accompanied by Judge Lindsley, who advises with him on the legal aspects of the food bill, came to see me Saturday morning just before the convening of the Senate to discuss a few proposed amendments to the bill. It was so near the hour of convening the Senate that I requested them to come up to the office Sunday morning, and promised them I would endeavor to have the members of the Agricultural Committee present so that the proposed amendments might be discussed by them.

I submitted the matter of Mr. Hoover's request to the members of the committee, and they subscribed to the following agreement:

We, members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, will meet informally with Mr. Hoover Sunday morning at 10 o'clock in the Military Affairs Committee room of the Senate to discuss with him certain features of the food-regulation bill.

GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN.	A. J. GRONNA.
WILLIAM H. THOMPSON.	JAMES H. BRADY.
T. P. GORE.	WILLIAM S. KENYON.
MORRIS SHEPPARD.	G. W. NORRIS.
HOKE SMITH.	JOHN B. KENDRICK.
E. D. SMITH.	JOSEPH E. RANSDELL.
ED. S. JOHNSON.	F. E. WARREN.

I believe the agreement was signed by every member of the committee to whom it was presented.

In pursuance of the request of the committee, a meeting was held in the Military Affairs Committee room at 10 o'clock. Mr. Hoover was present, and Judge Lindsley as well, the proposed amendments were discussed.

* * * * * * *

I will say, Mr. President, that I do not remember ever having met any of these gentlemen except Mr. Dinwiddie, and he has always treated me with the greatest courtesy and consideration, and has never attempted to intrude his presence upon me either as a member of the Agricultural Committee or in any other way. I think the article in question does all these distinguished gentlemen very great injustice. I ask that the letters to which I have referred may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JUNE 30, 1917.

To the PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.:

We have earnestly considered the statement in your letter of yesterday to the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America, that in the face of the present food crisis you are greatly concerned lest the early passage of the food-administration legislation now pending in Congress be jeopardized by a heated and protracted debate upon certain sections of the bill relating to the manufacture of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquors.

We are aware of the threats made by the friends of beer and wine in the Senate of an indefinite and protracted filibuster against those provisions of the bill. We beg to assure you that as patriotic Americans, determined to uphold you as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in the present war, we will not for our constituents offer any obstruction to the prompt passage of the food-control bill.

Of course we can not presume to indicate to Members of Congress what action they should take in view of this request from the President of the United States. They will doubtless act in accordance with their convictions of duty.

We are glad to note that your request applies only to the pending food-administration legislation. It will be our purpose to urge the passage of legislation prohibiting the waste of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beer and wines at the earliest possible date, either in the form of a separate bill or in connection with other war legislation.

We assure you of our purpose as patriotic American citizens to cooperate in every possible way in the winning of the great war in which our Nation is engaged.

Sincerely and respectfully, yours,

P. A. BAKER,
General Superintendent.
EDWIN C. DINWIDDIE,
Legislative Superintendent.
JAMES CANNON, Jr.,
ARTHUR BARTON,
WAYNE B. WHEELER,
Legislative Committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in pursuance of the call of the members of the committee for the meeting yesterday, the committee met and discussed some of the proposed amendments, and adjourned to meet again this morning at 10 o'clock. The amendments which were suggested by the committee will be reported to the Senate in due course. The committee, not by unanimous consent, but by a majority of the members present, have agreed upon a substitute for the liquor provision in the bill. I desire at this time to have it read into the RECORD, so that Senators may know what has been done with respect to it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he knows whether or not the President made the request of the patriotic Senators who opposed this prohibition feature of the bill to withdraw their opposition in order that the bill might pass?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the foregoing letter contains all I know about the President's views. I have not had any communication with or from him on the subject, and the letter which has just been read covers all I know about his views. I ask that the proposed amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

"SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the manufacture of distilled spirits for beverage purposes. (b) Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such liquors is essential, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food or feed, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall have been given and shall remain unrevoked, no person shall, after a reasonable time, which shall be prescribed in such notice, use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of such vinous, malt, or fermented liquors except in accordance with the limitations, regulations, and prohibitions prescribed in such notice, or to produce any such liquors having an alcoholic content in excess of the amount prescribed therefor in such notice. When the question arises as to whether any particular product is suitable for food or feed, the question shall be determined by the President, and his determination shall be conclusive for the purposes of this section. (c) Except as otherwise herein provided, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be charged with the administration of this section, and he is authorized, with the approval of the President, to require the taking out of such permits, the keeping of such records, the execution of such bonds, and the observance of such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the execution of the same. (d) Any person who wilfully violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both."

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to ask permission out of order, and I think it is pertinent at this time, to have a telegram read, addressed to me from the Anti-Saloon League of Mississippi, and my reply thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"JACKSON, MISS., July 1, 1917.

"Senator J. K. VARDAMAN,
"Washington, D. C.:

"We are depending on you to do your best for a bone-dry war measure. Do not exempt beer and wine.
